Ami wondered why the dwarfs were so afraid of seeing her directly. She put the question aside for the moment and moved her Keeper sight to a small labyrinth made of upright stone plates. Getting a sufficient amount of samples to determine her dungeon's themes had been simple in the end. She had taken one empty chamber, filled it with standing rock slabs, and added a horde of imps. Under instructions that no two slabs should share the same motive, the imps had quickly fortified everything. The resulting engravings had been diverse as well as instructive.

Averting her gaze, Ami transported a crystal ball to the centre of the art gallery. "All right, it's ready." Immediately, she heard a choking noise, probably from the wizard handling the dwarf's crystal ball.

"By Urmak's anvil!" the messenger exclaimed at the same time. "That's- I'm not sure-"

"I can't help it that the theme most opposed to a death god is fertility! Or that the corruption is putting its own spin on it!" Ami shouted, her cheeks feeling as if they were on fire.

"Ah, quite, your Majesty," the dwarf said, gulping.

"Just - aim for something classy, please!" Ami blurted out. Privately, she was willing to settle for something that wouldn't get her arrested on indecency charges. "I'll do what I can to shift the manifestations more towards plants."

"Do try to minimise the occurrence of mushrooms, though," Jered added.

"I don't see any mush- oh. Yes. Well, I shall report this to my liege, but I have no doubt that our craftsmen would be able to handle this highly unusual challenge."

Ami could feel the heat radiating from her face. "Good. Jered will work out the financial details of the transaction with you." She stood and nodded at the wavy-haired man before fleeing the embarrassing conversation.

In the office next door, she stumbled upon Tiger and Cathy. The former sat on the blonde's desk, holding rectangles that looked suspiciously like photos.

Cathy slapped her leg, making the armour ring. "... his face! Hah! And the fairies!"

"That was a stroke of good luck," Tiger agreed, sniggering.

"What exactly are you two doing?" Ami asked, narrowing her eyes at the images as she got closer.

"Oh, Cathy here tipped me off about who here wears conjured clothes aside from you. I just had to wait for the right moment, and-"

The door to the corridor flew open and banged against the wall. "Where is she?" Jadeite, wild-eyed and clad in a pristine new uniform, blocked the doorway.

"Eeep!" With a quick leap, Tiger rolled off the table and into cover behind Ami.

Scowling, the dark general snapped his fingers, causing every photograph in the room to burst into flame.

"My reports!" Cathy screamed as the smell of burnt paper rose from her desk. Thinking quickly, she threw herself on the tiny fires, quenching them.

"Mercury. Your sister needs to be disciplined," Jadeite stated, dark power crackling around him as he stared at the youma.

"Protect me, little sister!" Tiger said, holding Ami like a shield. She leaned down and whispered into the younger girl's ear "I can make copies for you!"

Ami froze for a moment as her mind speculated on what those images could have shown. Darn it, she had just stopped blushing! "No fighting," she declared. "Jadeite, stand down. Tiger, hand over that camera."

"Spoilsport." Tiger pouted and tossed the offending object to Jadeite.

A bolt of blackness from the curly-haired blonde reduced the object to tiny pieces in mid-flight. Clay shards clattered to the floor as the glamour on them faded.

"Tiger, that was a mean prank. Cathy, shame on you for encouraging her," Ami scolded the older girls.

"Sorry, I thought we all could use a good laugh after all that has happened," the swordswoman said. Seeing Ami's unamused expression, she continued "Seriously, it's not as if someone was hurt. In fact, consider it a preview of what will happen to everyone if you don't get the corruption thing managed. How did your negotiations about that go, anyway?" she blatantly changed the topic.

"I think the dwarfs will accept the deal. I was afraid they'd just abort the talks when I got to the part about that theme, though."

"Understandable," Cathy nodded.

Ami caught Jadeite staring intently at a spot on her forehead. "Jadeite? Is something wrong?" She asked, suddenly feeling very self-conscious.

"Well, it it looks as if your hair is starting to go grey," the dark general said.

Ami twitched. "What?" Wait, she was wearing a conjured wig. Corruption, then. "That must be ash from earlier!" she blurted out. Judging from his sceptical expression, he didn't quite believe her.

"Sooo," Tiger ended the awkward silence, "we'll have exciting new fashion designed by dwarven master tailors soon? Compliant with the three newest trends in dungeon aesthetics?"

"It's very likely," Ami agreed, not entirely sure where the youma was going with this. Her grin promised imminent discomfort.

"Good. So only one important question remains!" Tiger put her hands on Ami's shoulders and gently pushed her toward the dark general. "Jadeite, which of the three available corruption styles would you prefer her new clothes to favour? Transparent, lingerie, or barely there?"

"TIGER!"

A knight wearing a dented and scraped suit of full plate leaned against one of the hall's many pillars, chipping away at the floor tiles as he tapped his armoured foot. He had kept his gear in great shape when compared to that of the dozens of similar figures around him. His ancient armour even retained a few patches of its coat of black paint and didn't squeak at all when he jumped to the side.

A skeletal, clawed foot bigger than his torso slammed down on the spot where he had just been standing. It swivelled, grinding stone underneath its weight as a hind leg twice as tall as the knight repositioned itself.

Leaning back, the warrior flipped open his visor and spat a curse in the direction of the distant, horned skull at the end of the creature's arching spine.

The dragon skeleton continued to ignore his existence, or perhaps its head was simply too far away to hear him over the general chatter. Crouching so it didn't bump into the ceiling, it took another step forward and joined the animated discussion between a bandage-wrapped mummy and a skeleton in faded warlock robes.

Pursing parchment-like lips, the undead knight turned away and searched for a path that would get him closer to the front of the dense crowd. He knew better than to take a short-cut through the only empty space among the forest of pillars. The priests of Crowned Death, thirteen black-robed figures cordoning off an area around the high priest himself, would punish such disrespect.

He focused on the beetle-like throne that towered above the masses, walking around on six spindly bone legs. On it, the high priest himself lounged like a decadent monarch, wrapped in six layers of gold-trimmed black cloth. His mask of rubies and amber scowled and glittered coldly as he pointed his empty eye-sockets at the balcony high up the closest wall.

The air carried a faint trace of rot and ancient dust as Mukrezar stepped up to the balcony's railing and addressed the ghostly illusion floating before him. "High priest. Are your underlings done with applying the protective spells?"

"Yes, they have finished layering their wards over your own." The projection crossed its arms. "Were this any other opponent, I would consider your precautions paranoid."

"Yes, you have mentioned that before." Mukrezar looked right through the transparent image, narrowing his eyes at the distant real body of the priest below. "So, are you satisfied with the preparations?"

"There should be no way for anyone to spy on us," the high priest acknowledged grudgingly.

"Good!" Mukrezar clapped his hands, making his wide, gold-embroidered sleeves sway from the motion. "Then it is time to finally get started!"

Trumpets sounded and banners unrolled from the edge of his balcony, reaching almost to the floor. Between the proudly-displayed white reaper heads on red cloth, a portcullis screeched as it withdrew into the ceiling.

"Quiet!" Mukrezar raised his hands, his amplified voice rolling like thunder over his audience. When all empty eye-sockets and milky, decayed orbs focused on him, he continued "The moment you have all been waiting for approaches! It is time for me to reveal my grand plan!"

The hall fell silent, letting his words echo.

"High priest, why don't you lead the congregation in prayer while my imps bring in one of the vital components? I'm sure Crowned Death is as eager to get the details as all of you are."

The high priest nodded, and the thirteen priests surrounding him raised their bone staves as he started chanting in a long-dead language.

All around them, the various undead sank to their knees, pressed their foreheads to the ground, and joined in the prayer. Meanwhile, imps emerged from the portcullis, chained to a wheeled platform carrying a large cube.

Mukrezar smirked as it advanced through the ranks of bowed backs, their owners unable to look up and satisfy their curiosity. The box's intricate golden leaf pattern and strong magical aura screamed "ancient magical artefact of elven make" to those in the know.

The death priests, still standing, simply watched it approach as they continued their prayers. Soon enough, an oppressive presence weighted down on the chamber. The feeling was fainter than in a temple, but unmistakable.

"Lord Crowned Death," Mukrezar said, bowing his head. "Welcome! Thank you for gracing us humble beings with your attention!" He straightened. "Now, without further ado - a little speech!"

His audience groaned, more so than was typical for the undead.

The pink-haired elf pointed at his chest with his thumb and grinned.

"Evil, remember?"

Dead faces failed to reflect any kind of amusement.

"Tough crowd. Oh well." He cleared his throat. "I guess I can let a small detail about my plan slip already to whet your appetite," he said. "You'll be happy to learn that I'd be extremely surprised if it led to any of you being set on fire!"

A faint murmur of approval echoed through the hall, though the presence of the death god began to radiate annoyance, tinged with barely-controlled anger.

Mukrezar wisely decided to hurry up. "Servants of Crowned Death! You may be wondering why I asked for you specifically. That's simple: you are his best and his brightest! Not only are you vastly more powerful individually than the shambling hordes; more importantly, you are also smarter. Much smarter. You can follow complex instructions without supervision. You have the ability to effectively use magic. Surprises? They won't leave you stumped. Where other undead blindly follow orders, you can think on your feet, evaluate the situation, take the initiative and make decisions! Strategy and tactics are not beyond you. All of you are, dare I say it," Mukrezar swept his pointed index finger over the group, "qualified to lead. "And that," Mukrezar raised both hands theatrically, "that is why I wanted, no, needed you all here! That is why I need you all- "

Every single support pillar in the hall exploded outwards, and speeding rock shards scythed down the crowd. Domes of blue and purple lights flashed briefly where the rocks shattered against magical protections, while a thunderstorm of glowing lines flickered across every surface as wards overloaded and discharged. An instant later, the ceiling slammed down on the carnage, shaking the ground with its deafening impact.

Up on the balcony, the dusty blast of displaced air tossed Mukrezar against the wall.

Coughing, he climbed back to his feet and brushed the dirt from his robes. "- need you all to disappear." He peered over the railing at the massive column of rock and debris that had replaced the room. "Yes, exactly like that. Thank you very much for your cooperation." His mouth curved upwards as he addressed the stunned outrage and searing fury emanating from the general location of the debris. "By the way, I quit."

The death god's fury turned into bloody-minded murderous intent.

Mukrezar put his hands on his head and cowered. "Oh dear, you want me dead. Woe is me! I shall be spending the brief remainder of my days in mortal terror, always looking over my shoulder and hiding from your cult!" He turned his head and glanced at the pile of rocks. "Except I just decapitated it. Whoops. Well, never mind then. Guess I'm just going to mock you instead. Ahem." He waved his hands as if scaring a bunch of chickens. "Shoo, go away. Don't you have more failures to oversee? I'm not afraid of a dark god with no minions to do his bidding!"

With the priests' chanting interrupted, Crowned Death's presence started to fade, but his searing hatred didn't. He must have been compensating for the poorer transmission with an increase in intensity.

"So, you probably want to know why I did it. Did I wish to avoid conflict with Mercury? Did I resent being ordered around? Did your enemies bribe me enough? Did another dark god offer me a better deal? Or did I find out about what happened fifteen years ago?"

He paused for effect. "All of those, actually. Still, that's not the important reason."

A hint of curiosity briefly flickered through the death god's loathing.

"My true motive, of course, is pride!" the elf stated, beaming. "I had to remind the world that I am still the greatest Keeper, so I needed to one-up Empress Mercury. She merely ruined your master plan. Me? I wiped out your influence in this world on a whim!" Mukrezar thrust a fist in the air. "Today, your cult. Soon, the Avatar!"

Last edited: Jul 1, 2016

A Hairy Situation

Originally on 2012-12-01T00:08:00

Disguised with her hat and cloak, Ami slowly walked through the cluttered passage between towering bookshelves. To her left, four goblins squealed as they wobbled on a ladder and passed books upwards from hand to hand.

"No, the top left, you illiterate morons!" a red-faced warlock shouted at them from the ground, his back turned toward Ami.

She could see glimpses of his pale flesh through the bursting seams of his robe, which looked as if it had shrunk in the wash until it clung skin-tight to his body. The corruption's effects were spreading at an alarming rate, she pondered, cheeks flushing behind the high collar. At least the goblins seemed immune, mostly because they weren't wearing much more than loincloths anyway.

Ami stepped past the magic user without a word and ducked into a gap between book piles when a corpulent warlock rushed past. A file of goblins ran after him like harried ducklings, wheezing and carrying heavy grimoires.

She reached the shelf she was looking for and pouted in disappointment when she could see the bare wall of the library through the large gaps between the books. The spell she was looking for was missing. She glanced over to her right, where more of the greenskins were chatting among themselves while packing tomes into a crate. A haggard warlock with a permanently furrowed brow was circling them and watching them like a hawk.

Ami hoped the list in his hands could tell her where the book currently was. She approached the group just when the goblins were lifting the crate on their shoulders. "Excuse me-"

The greenskins turned their heads to face her, and one of them spotted the red glow between the edge of her hat and the top of her cloak's collar. He whirled around to salute her, taking his hands off the crate. Caught off guard by the sudden change in weight distribution, the other goblins stumbled and lost their grip on the wood.

With a loud clatter, the heavy box landed on the supervisor's foot and broke apart, spilling books all over the carpet. He howled in pain and started hopping on one leg. A lot of loud cursing later, he finally noticed that the goblins weren't jeering at his misfortune. Instead, they were saluting a shortish figure standing nearby.

"Y-Your Majesty?" he asked, a pained expression on his face. His bow was shallow and crooked from favouring his good leg.

"At ease, everyone," Ami said to the group. She looked at the books littering the ground. "Are those from the shelf behind me?"

The magician nodded, biting his lips.

"Thank you. You should have that foot looked at," she informed him. "Wait, don't walk. I will send you to Snyder." With a wave of her hand, she transferred him to the large hall that passed as the dungeon's infirmary for the moment. "The rest of you, go help the other warlocks," she told the goblins.

The triangle-eared creatures ran off, leaving her alone with the broken crate and disorderly pile of books and scrolls on the ground.

She sighed, her shoulders slumping. How was she going to find the spell she needed in that mess?

"Your Majesty!" Torian swept around a corner at a fast but dignified pace, his face flushed as if he had been running. "I am happy to see that you are back from your," his wide smile faltered for a moment, "excursion, and none the worse for wear!"

Ami winced a little at that. Snyder had strongly objected to her being up and about half a day after having her wounds healed, in particular since she hadn't gone to bed at all in the first place. "I'm very glad to be back, too," she answered honestly.

Torian nodded and clapped his hands. "Now, what can I help you with, Empress? Please excuse the noise and disorder but," he shrugged "goblins. Not exactly the first, or second, or even third choice of assistants I would pick when it comes to moving and indexing books. If I may ask, did we displease you in some way to get them as help?"

"I need all my imps for urgent construction work," Ami explained. Having both her minions and the townspeople in prolonged proximity to each other was a recipe for disaster. Thus, her imps were currently hard at work at expanding the formerly undead-infested gold mine with sufficient living space for more than eight-thousand inhabitants.

"That's too bad, really." Behind him, a goblin yelled as she fell from a ladder, but his only reaction was a resigned sigh. "Would it, perhaps, be possible to delay the reorganisation until your imps are free?" he asked hopefully.

"No, this move is the perfect opportunity to get everything done in one go," Ami dashed his hopes. That didn't really answer his question, but she doubted he would appreciate learning that she simply wanted to keep her employees too busy to start trouble with the civilians. It wasn't as if she was assigning make-work - she really wanted a more efficient filing system for her library, and she did need all those doors the trolls were constructing, and the dark elves were a big help in the kitchen, and - well, suffice it to say that there were a lot of time-consuming tasks that could keep her creatures occupied, even if they wouldn't normally be considered urgent.

Torian knew better than to question his Keeper's decisions. "As you wish, your Majesty. Is there anything I can assist you with?"

"Um, I wanted to look at a specific spell, but apparently, the scroll is somewhere inside this pile." She indicated the mess on the ground.

"Well, that won't do at all. Allow me." Torian spread his arms, wide sleeves swishing, and closed his eyes. The heap quaked and trembled as he muttered under his breath, and a number of scrolls rose to the surface and floated up into the air. "Is the spell you need among these?"

Ami rapidly scanned the labels of the rolled-up parchments arranged in grid formation in the air before her. They weren't organised according to any system she could recognise, but after a short search, she snatched one of them out of the air.

"An interesting choice," Torian said, leaning over her shoulder. When had he gotten behind her, anyway? "Very niche. Will you allow me to know what undoubtedly devious plans you will be using it in?"

"I am currently dissatisfied with the length of my hair." Ami patted her hat demonstratively.

Torian blinked. "Ah." He only stared at her blankly for a split-second before his smile returned. "I feel that I should warn you that this spell, as its nickname - the Beastly Beard Booster - implies, is meant for growing facial hair only."

Ami's shoulders drooped. Things never could be simple, could they?

"However," Torian held up a finger, "I am quite skilled at adapting existing spells to new purposes. Changing the target region should be a rather simple manipulation. If I may?" He held out his open hand.

Ami relinquished the scroll to him. It wasn't as if she had much to lose here.

Torian walked over to a wooden bookstand and removed a feather from its inkwell."Yes, as I suspected, this is rather standard fare. Let's see, scratch this rune, carry the two, switch words around here..."

With scholarly interest, Ami watched her head warlock work. Unfortunately, his handwriting made observing anything useful a little difficult.

"... and done!" With a bow, he thrust the annotated scroll to her. "Please go ahead, your Majesty!"

Ami shrank back in the face of so much enthusiasm. "Ah, I'm not in the habit of just using untested new spells on myself."

"Of course not, that would be foolish," Torian agreed. "I erroneously assumed you would like to perform the tests yourself, your Majesty. I regret my mistake." Before Ami could stop him, he pointed both hands at a passing goblin.

The greenskin stumbled in mid-step when his head sprouted coarse stubble in a lovely moss-green shade.

"That- but you can't just-" Ami protested. "Goblins normally don't even have hair!"

Torian clapped his hands. "Perfect proof that the spell is working as intended!"

"That's not what I mean! You can't just go and test magic on my other employees, especially if it might harm them!"

"The creature does not look overly distressed to me," Torian said.

In fact, other goblins had stopped to gawk at their unusual comrade, who was prancing about and enjoying his new-found celebrity status. His expression only turned sour after the first curious yank on his mane.

Ami slowly lowered the arm with which she had been pointing at the goblin and glared at her head warlock.

"Very well. I shall use a prisoner next time," he conceded.

"No experiments on anyone at all unless I approve it," Ami snapped. "That goes for everyone else too!"

"As you wish, Empress." Torian lowered his head, sounding mildly confused. "Would you like to peruse my modified spell now?"

After a deep and calming breath, Ami nodded and took the scroll from him, her mood brightening. She could finally get rid of her baldness and stop wearing this ridiculous pointy hat! Her gaze darted over the adjusted text of the spell. She still had trouble reading Torian's scribbles, but since the scroll was inside of her library, the knowledge of how to cast the spell appeared in the back of her mind anyway. "It seems easy enough," she said as she raised one hand, green sparks dancing around its digits.

Moments later, she could feel her scalp tingle. A sudden burst of growth swept her hat away, and her vision went dark. Ami called a mirror to her hand and brushed aside a strand of blue hair so she could see her reflection.

"And that, my Empress, is what happens when you put too much power into the spell." Torian lectured.

"Torian," Ami began in a voice that had the warlock edge away from her. She turned towards him, one eyebrow that now hung down to her chin twitching. "Did you, by any chance, only expand the target region?"

A marble-sized void forced the arcs of energy whipping around it into a tightening spiral. Whenever they discharged into the black orb,a resulting flash pierced the twilight.

"Steady now!" Kunzite ordered, eyes aglow with power. Through his hands, he sent dark energy down the crystalline stalk of the pedestal before him. He held his breath when the eighth out of initially ten capacitor pillars shattered, crumbling into a pile of ash and glass dust.

Behind the central pedestal, Zoisite hissed through clenched teeth, beads of perspiration gleaming on his forehead.

"Nephrite, cancel out that fluctuation," Kunzite instructed with a sideways glance.

The third dark general frowned, and the high-pitched whine coming from the two remaining capacitors subsided after a moment.

"I have broken through!" Zoisite shouted in triumph. His long hair waved behind him as he thrust his hand at the fault in space.With a noise like shattering glass, the phenomenon collapsed in on itself before flaring out into a dark tunnel entrance.

Kunzite kept his face implacable, but inwardly, he let out a sigh of relief. Queen Beryl's reaction to another failure would not have been pleasant.

"That's weird. Zoisite, you messed up!" Nephrite said, pointing at specks of gold that swirled in the outer perimeter of the portal.

"Who mess-"

Kunzite glanced at the phenomenon. "Remains of the barrier," he interrupted before the others could start one of their frequent squabbles. He smiled in satisfaction as Nephrite crossed his arms and dropped the matter, and he turned to face the two dozen youma waiting around the portal. "Troops, advance and secure a beachhead on the-"

Startled shouts interrupted him as fog the colour of clotted blood rushed out of the black ellipse, creeping along the floor like an unrolling carpet.

Most of the surrounding youma leapt away before the miasma covered more than their ankles. Tar-like tendrils stuck to their feet before snapping back into the main mass of the fog.

The slower youma winced and cursed, batting at their legs as they followed their companions into the air. Strange vermin made of thorns and gleaming shells skittered up their legs, joints and mandibles clicking.

Kunzite smelled sulphur and other stenches that he could even begin to identify. A burning sensation in the back of his throat made him cough. Was the fog toxic? He hadn't had to deal with a poison that could get through his magical protections for a long time now. Scowling, he covered his nose and mouth with his cape and gestured in the direction of the portal.

A shimmering cylinder of force appeared around the gateway, trapping the two closest youma within. Their slit-shaped pupils contracted in surprise as they slammed into the barrier, which was quickly filling with the vile fog. Waves of blue raced along the curved surface as they hammered against it with their fist, mouths opening and closing as it absorbed their pleas to be let out.

Dispassionately, Kunzite watched them writhe as the misshapen pests stung and bit. It didn't look as if the fog was killing the youma quickly, toxic or not. "Zoisite, connect the portal to somewhere safer!" he ordered, maintaining the shield.

"I'm - trying!" his boyfriend wheezed out between coughs. He twitched and slapped a finger-long spiky thing off his trouser leg. "Ow! Something bit me!"

"The portal, you fool," Nephrite reminded him.

This time, Kunzite didn't reprimand the other general. Not only because he was getting a little impatient too , but also because he was finding it increasingly difficult to maintain his barrier. His vision was swimming. "Youma, get rid of the vermin that got through! Zoisite, what are you waiting for?"

"It's not responding to my commands!" the other dark general complained. Pouting, he alternated between glancing at his hand and at the dark ellipse.

Kunzite frowned and spared a moment of attention for the youma, despite the building pressure behind the shield. Fans of flame, blue explosions, and bursts of dark energy were reducing the spiny vermin to shreds with little trouble. That situation, at least, seemed under control.

"So, what exactly did we drill into there?" Nephrite broke the sudden silence. He walked out from behind his console and approached the barrier, smoking carapaces crunching underneath his feet.

Kunzite shrugged. "I don't particularly care. We finally reached the target world, that is all that matters." His gaze wandered back to the two youma still trapped behind his force field.

One of them was twitching on the ground, covered in welts and bites. The other stood with her back to the barrier and dispensed sprays of acid from her fingers, protected by a layer of radiant blue slime. She might have looked a little sickly - it was hard to tell her skin tone through the layer of acid and dissolving critters - but she seemed fine otherwise.

Kunzite furrowed his brow. "Anchor the containment field." He didn't feel like maintaining the barrier on his own all day.

The youma shuffled their feet, and some glanced over at the two figures still trapped in the fog. Still, none dared speak out against his order. "Yes, Lord Kunzite." Working in pairs, they carried cone-shaped stones to the barrier and placed them on the floor. One after the other, they shoved them closer until they touched the force field in six equidistant spots.

Yellow symbols flared up on the anchor stones, and Kunzite felt the drain on his power dwindle to nothing. With his magic now freed to assist his recovery, he was feeling healthier by the second.

"But Kunzite, what about the portal?" Zoisite asked, the sweat on his brow now running down his face.

That was a good question, the white-haired general pondered. The anchor stones had been intended to stabilise the gateway. With the barrier in the way though, it would be difficult to impossible to properly apply them. Still, Queen Beryl would not be happy with further delays...

Within the fog-filled cylinder, the youma twitching on the floor stopped moving and disintegrated into fine dust.

Well, it did look as if the troops could survive long enough within that damnable atmosphere to get the job done. He could just drop the barrier, and-

A large limb shot from the portal, aimed straight at the acid-coated youma. The bony knob at its end unfolded like a sea anemone, and segmented digits wrapped around her torso. With a brutal yank, the appendage disappeared back into the black ellipse, taking the youma with it.

"What in the Great Ruler's name was that?" one of the other youma shrieked, backing away from the fog-filled barrier.

Kunzite hadn't gotten a good look at the limb in the split-second that it had been visible either. Whatever it was, it made simply dropping the shield a much less appealing proposition. With a sigh, he turned to Zoisite. "You can stop maintaining the portal."

"What? After all this effort, we just give up?"

"Do you wish to explain to Queen Beryl why we lost youma before the invasion even began? We'll try a different spot later." Kunzite walked away, his cape swishing behind him. "Under the circumstances, we can't properly stabilise this gate."

"What a grand waste of time," Nephrite commented with a much put-upon expression before he faded out of sight.

"What is... it's not closing!" Zoisite shouted. "Something on the other side is keeping it open!"

The sound of alarm in the other dark general's voice prompted Kunzite to whirl around and return to his side. "Enemy action," he muttered. Just hitting a bad location could have been an accident, but maintaining a portal required deliberate interference. He narrowed his eyes at the golden particles still swirling around the edge of the black ellipse. "I'll close it myself." He raised one hand, palm facing outwards, and prepared to crush the gateway out of existence by compressing the shield.

The portal chose that moment to grow larger and larger, its edges passing through the barrier with no resistance. Soon, a light-devouring black pane whose borders disappeared into the surrounding rock bisected the room.

Kunzite took an involuntary step back when shrieking wails pierced the air and the first freakish invaders charged forth from the portal.

Last edited: Jul 1, 2016

Vanity Issues

Originally on 2013-01-26T01:54:00

Ami turned her head left and right, inspecting her reflection in a wall that resembled a jagged sheet of ice. Despite its appearance, the corrupted stone didn't feel cold to her touch, and one of its dark surfaces was mirror-smooth. She traced the thin red lines marring her chin and throat with two fingers, their fingertips glowing a soft green. When she pulled them away, they were stained red, but the tiny cuts were gone.

"Finally." She stepped out of the pile of coarse blue hair at her feet. It was time to eliminate the last traces of her struggle against the Thing That Should Not Have Been. "You," she told the two imps who were chasing each other around her legs, "stop that and get rid off the rest!"

With disappointed squeals, the little servants dropped their hair whips and scuttled off to get brooms and buckets.

Satisfied, Ami returned her attention to her reflection in the mirror. She looked like a stranger to herself. Long blue hair cascaded down her back and reached to the floor, the strands in front tucked away behind her shoulders so they didn't block her sight. Fortunately, their weight kept them from sliding back to annoy her.

"Cathy, are you free for the moment?" she sent a telepathic message toward the swordswoman. While Ami wasn't entirely displeased by her new look, tripping over her own hair was unacceptable.

"The soldiers won't hurt themselves much training for a while without my supervision," Cathy's distorted voice answered in Ami's head. "That's a yes. What do you need?"

"I'll tell you in person. Transport impending." Ami reached through space, picked up the blonde, and set her down a few metres away.

"Hiding out in an unfinished tunnel?" The armour-clad woman commented after a brief glance at her surroundings. One already raised eyebrow crept higher when she focused properly on Ami. "The beard thing was true, then? Imagine."

Ami twitched. "I had hoped I had left before too many people could get a good look," she commented sourly.

"Only takes a single goblin to talk. They do love to talk." Cathy walked around the younger girl, inspecting her untamed mane. "Right now, your minions are speculating about why you'd want to make yourself look more appealing to dwarfs."

Ami groaned. "It was just a spell accident!"

"Female dwarfs at that," Cathy continued mercilessly, the play of the muscles around her eyes betraying her amusement.

"Please, stop," Ami said, holding up her palms. As if the corruption remodelling her dungeon wouldn't cause enough new and embarrassing rumours already. "Cathy, can you cut my hair please?" She asked, producing a pair of scissors from thin air.

"I'm not much of a barber," the blonde cautioned.

"Well, I don't think the imps could do a good job, and I'd prefer not to have any of my other subordinates get too close to me with sharp tools."

"That I can understand. Okay, sit down," the swordswoman said as she removed her gauntlets.

Ami took a seat on a conveniently-sized boulder, glad that it wasn't as cold as its ice-like appearance would lead one to believe.

"How do you want it?" Cathy asked as she dragged her fingers through Ami's hair.

Ami hesitated. Sometimes, she had thought herself rather plain-looking in comparison to Usagi and Rei, and had wished her hair was as long as theirs. Would Jadeite like her better with long hair? She had no idea because she knew distressingly little about him.

Come to think of it, did Beryl have long hair? Vanity aside, her primary motivation for keeping her hair short hadn't really changed. Long hair took a lot of time and effort to take care of, which she could spend better elsewhere - especially now that she was busier than ever. "Please cut it the same as it was before," she requested.

"Really? It's a shame to get rid of it all," Cathy muttered as she stepped to the side, her reflection distorting because she was no longer in front of the flat part of the wall. "Don't you think you'd look nice with braids or a ponytail?"

"Ah, everyone is used to my regular look now," Ami objected. "I don't think my non-human subordinates are good at telling humans apart by their faces, either."

"Yeah, it's not as if you have a distinctive hair colour or glowing eyes or anything," Cathy agreed in a deadpan voice. "Still, you can just grow it out again whenever you want." With a snip, a long lock of blue hair dropped to the ground. "So, what are you currently working on?"

"When I'm not adding more rooms to handle the needs of the population I'm expanding the power infrastructure," Ami said. "The magma is a lot deeper down here than on the Avatar Islands. The imps will get there, eventually, but for the moment we are drawing on gold reserves."

"I haven't heard anything about sending scouts to the surface yet, so I assume there are no windmills?" Cathy asked while she worked.

"Correct. I'm wary about adjusting the corruption for proper storms before the other problems with it are solved."

"That's probably for the best," the blonde agreed as she tilted Ami's head to the side. "Speaking of the corruption, Rabixtrel was distinctly unamused by what it was doing to his gear. I sent him back to the Islands to patrol the beaches for undead critters. Hope you don't mind."

Angry reaper? That was one problem Ami was happy had been avoided. "That was the best decision you could take. I'm glad you got to him while he was still willing to listen."

"So am I. Oh, I think he gave the prisoner a scare on the way out."

"Oh, her." Ami's Keeper sight darted over to the prison cell close to the portal. She was treated to some very inventive foul language as the captured sorceress swore at her guards. "Do you think Tiger would be qualified to interrogate her? I'd really like to learn what she knows about the attack, but I'm afraid my other subordinates would go too far."

"She's your sister. I have no idea where she is or what she is currently doing, in any case," Cathy replied. In the mirror, Ami's hair was beginning to resemble what she was used to.

"She's delivering mail and buying supplies in the surface kingdoms," Ami informed the blonde. She sighed as a flash of a tavern interior arrived through her Keeper sight."I don't expect to be seeing her for a while. Is there anything else I should be aware of?"

The movement of the scissors stopped for a moment. "Well, the Light's rope is gone," Cathy said. "Just poof, vanished. Or maybe it's still there and we just can't find it. Either way, we don't have it any more." Snip. "Also, the Avatar isn't talking to us since he's busy campaigning somewhere. Stop nodding or I'll cut your hair wrong."

"Sorry."

"Then, there's that dungeon of Clairmonte in the swamp. Surface troops moved in shortly after we withdrew our soldiers," Cathy reported. "Should I send some back to the other three sites to keep them under our control?"

Ami pondered this for a moment. "No, they aren't worth the commitment right now. It's more important to keep this place secure. What's the status of our reaperbots?"

"Not so great. Most work, but they took some damage from the lethal corruption and need repairs. I have the detailed list on my desk, if you want to see it."

"Yes, thank you. I'll have a look at it." Ami pulled the indicated document through space and read through it for the rest of her hairdressing session.

"Get out here right now!" was the only warning Dolzene received before the door to her cave flew open and banged into the wall, causing one of its cobbled-together boards to fall off.

Startled, the rudely-awakened youma shot upright and almost fell out of her hammock. She jumped to her feet and glared at the slender silhouette in the doorway, easily recognising the other youma by the green flames she had for hair. "What the hell, Kuzza?" she hissed through wolf-like teeth. "You are going to fix that!" she added, pointing at the splinters.

"Not now!" Kuzza hissed. "Umuk wants all warriors at the village centre! We are about to be attacked!"

Dolzene quickly snatched a dress made of scaly leather from the hook on the wall. In her rush, she bent her antennas painfully as she pulled the garment over her head. "Enemies? Here?" she gasped as she stepped out on the steep hillside. Why would anyone want to attack this collection of hovels? Kar-Il-Beryl was a backwater. Yes, there was a spring of dark magic at the bottom of the valley, but it was neither strong nor rare enough to be worth fighting over. Perhaps deeper in the wastelands, but not here.

"Maybe Nashitaka wants to rule over more subjects?" Kuzza speculated, glancing suspiciously in the direction of the spindly peaks that separated Kar-Il-Beryl from the next-closest village.

Nothing moved up there aside from the dark clouds creeping along the mountainsides.

"Great Ruler preserve us from ambitious morons!" Dolzene spat a heart-felt curse. With a leap, she took to the air.

A fist that felt like hot, moving rock caught her around the ankle and yanked her back to the ground. "Stay down, idiot! No flying! Do you want to make yourself a target?"

"Yeah, well, jogging next to someone whose main power is glowing in the dark isn't much safer!" Dolzene protested out of habit. Keeping in cover was good advice, actually. Almost everyone she knew had some sort of ranged attack. She swept her nervous gaze over the slope. How could she be sure there weren't already enemies lurking behind the greenish rocks or hiding in between the thorny mushrooms? They'd be almost impossible to spot in this twilight. She broke into a run, quietly following the other youma downhill to the village centre.

"There you two stragglers are. About time!" Umuk's harsh voice greeted them when they hopped over the squat wall that enclosed the village centre.

Dolzene suddenly found herself wishing the corral-like barrier was higher. It did a pretty good job at keeping the wind from filling the cracks in the ground with dust, but it wouldn't inconvenience even minimally motivated invaders. "Sorry, boss," she blurted out. Umuk was the leader, mainly because she'd stomp flat anyone who disagreed. So far, she hadn't given the others a reason yet to risk ganging up on her, which made her competent enough in Dolzene's opinion.

"Don't waste your breath! Get over there with the others and feed! We'll need to be at our best!" Green eyes set in a noseless face swerved towards the other youma huddling around the fissures in the ground.

The nine figures kept close to the crevices, soaking up the Great Ruler's power that seeped up from below.

Dolzene gladly joined the group and noticed that Kuzza settled down closer to the others than she normally did. Perhaps everyone was instinctively looking for safety in numbers? She certainly was feeling a little less nervous with others between her and a potentially fatal energy blast. A long sip from the magical source helped calm her nerves further. It would have been tastier if processed before consumption, but it was nourishing nonetheless.

"So what's going on?" someone asked, voicing Dolzene's own most pressing question.

Umak shrugged, the soft spines on her shoulders quaking. "We got orders from up high. All the way from the top, really. General Kunzite himself."

A gasp went through the crowd. None of the youma here had ever seen one of the generals - or even Queen Beryl's palace - with their own eyes, and now they were getting orders from there?

"Anyway, we are supposed to destroy a bunch of invaders that are coming our way, then report in at Keshlanfall's stronghold," Umuk continued.

Dolzene groaned. Combat. Also, Keshlanfall was about two days travel away. Oh well. Trying to look on the bright side, she hoped that whatever they had been drafted for would already be over by the time they reached the fortress and its teleport gate.

"Invaders?" Kuzza spoke up.

"A herd of weird rampaging beasts," Umuk said. "Some of them can apparently get pretty big and dangerous. Oh yeah, and I'm also supposed to show all of you how to do this, so watch closely!" She clapped her hands together. When she pulled them apart, a small sphere of light floated between her palms, humming softly as it shivered in the air. At a wave of Umuk's wrist, the bluish spark flew off, tumbling randomly through the air like a butterfly.

"What's that?" Dolzene asked as she tracked the slow-moving light.

Umuk shrugged. "Fuck if I know. Palace sent the spell along with our orders. We are supposed to keep some close to us at all times while we fight." She put her hands on the top of the wall and looked toward the east. "Now start practising it until you have it down! I'll be on the lookout for the enemy."

"No, you absolutely have to give them clear guidelines," Cathy explained, her voice echoing off the stone walls, the stone pillars, and the stone furniture. Even the elevated throne at the back of the room was made of the same smoothly-polished material.

It sounds like an empty room, Ami thought. Hopefully, hard stone would remain unchanged by the corruption for the duration of the gathering she had planned. "Why is defining a protocol so important?" she asked absently, watching her imps work from the edge of the dais she was standing on.

One of the black-eyes minions had just run out of padded mats. Unable to render the last of the twenty chairs around her assigned table less cold and uncomfortable, she stepped from one foot on the other and made confused noises.

"Look, I know you don't insist on formalities, but the villagers? They don't. They are used to rules for interacting with the nobility and will be lost without them. I doubt you'll get them to be of any use while they are busy worrying about when you are going to punish them for not scraping and bowing at the right time."

"The troops from the Underworld don't seem to have that issue." Now where had the imp's last padded mat gone? Ami's quick check of the other four tables didn't reveal it.

Cathy crossed her arms, looking a little annoyed. "That's because they are different. Mercenaries, not vassals. Besides," she pointed at Ami, "Keeper. They kind of expect you to just punish them whenever you feel like it, no matter how much they adhere to protocol. They obviously try not to annoy you, but since you haven't given any specific instructions about how to go about their grovelling, they just do whatever they think is appropriate."

"Is that so?" That was certainly a little irritating and also something Ami hadn't thought about in quite those terms. "So the civilians expect there to be rules that protect them as long as they don't break them, but my soldiers don't?"

"That's the gist of it."

"All right, I can see why a protocol would make them feel safer," Ami said with a nod. She also made a mental note to clarify things for her underlings later, once she had figured out how to go about it. "Can you please set something up, but keep it simple? Nothing lengthy or complicated. They'd probably get scared too if I didn't act as expected because I forgot the appropriate response."

"You won't have to do much," Cathy assured her. "I'll simply cover how to greet and address you, seating order, and similar things concerning their conduct." She paused and stared at the ceiling. "Also, that's one lazy imp."

Ami followed the blonde's gaze and spotted the missing mat, draped over one of the lamps hanging above each of the tables. On it slept an imp, curled around the wire. Ami blinked, surprised by an imp shirking her duties. She glanced at the table that had been assigned to the servant in question. All paddings and notepads already were in place. Not so much shirking duties as stealing from her fellows, then. How should she handle this?

The double door at the other end of the room swung open, interrupting her train of thought.

"Ah, Mercury, I see you are back to normal," Jered said as he entered the room, carrying a large packet wrapped in brown cloth in his arms. "Looking good."

Behind him, Jadeite paused and peered at the blue-haired girl more closely. "Back to normal from what?" he asked, sounding alarmed.

"I got a haircut," Ami answered quickly, sparing him - and herself - the grisly details.

"Oh." The dark general took a closer look at her head and nodded, his expression returning to polite disinterest.

"On that note, we need to address the issue of your wardrobe for your meeting with the civilians," Jered brought up.

Ami looked down at herself. With her hair restored, she had discarded the cloak, leaving her clad in her black, gold-embroidered Keeper uniform. "I can just keep wearing this," she said. Sure, the patterns might have shifted a little, and it was clinging tighter to her chest and hips than it used to, but the corruption hadn't managed anything worse yet. "It's not conjured, so it's holding up well, and I can hide further problems with magic for the duration of the meeting."

"I believe that would be missing a great opportunity," Jered said, "People will be upset about the styles that the corruption imposes on us." His teeth clenched as his brown eyes briefly darted down to his open shirt. All of the garment's buttons were missing, leaving his bare chest visible.

Ami nodded, agreeing so far. She wasn't exactly happy about what was going on either, to put it mildly.

"Well, there's a way to make them less upset. If they get the impression that you are humiliating them by forcing this garb on them, that will be bad," Jered continued. "If they realise they are in it with you together? Much less resistance and discontent. Therefore, you should be wearing one of the altered things for the meeting."

"What?" Ami's stomach plummeted at the mere thought of addressing a room full of people while wearing something that revealing. She still had Tiger's distressingly accurate summary of the available styles in mind."We don't have any adjusted outfits, though," she pointed out with great relief. "The dwarfs will need at least a few days to finish them." Which was one of the reasons for the assembly in the first place. She needed the local artisans to come up with stopgap solutions until the commissioned designs were ready.

"I have taken that into account." Jered unpacked his cargo onto one of room's tables, spreading out a varied selection of garments. "I asked Jadeite to conjure a large number of different outfits and then waited for the corruption to make its adjustments. These are the passable ones."

Ami's first impression was one of moth-eaten fabric, stains, and general ragged crudeness. "That's, um, nice," she said without conviction as she approached the table, peering at the various ensembles with morbid curiosity. She skipped the variants that resembled two-piece swimwear and examined the more substantial specimen. Between plunging necklines, snug leather, and fabric thin enough to be see-through, there wasn't a single one that hadn't her cheeks heating up.

Well, perhaps she was overreacting a little. Some of these outfits could conceivably be worn by someone in her world going out partying. Someone much more confident than her. Someone who wouldn't mind the disapproving looks and whispers from her elders.

And then there was the stuff like the wizard robe that rattled when Cathy lifted it. "This doesn't look very comfortable," the swordswoman commented as she inspected the mosaic of crystal shards interconnected by bits of fabric. She draped one of its sleeves over her eyes. "Not to mention that it doesn't hide anything! I'm sure you can see me scowling at you right through it, Jered!"

"The pattern is opaque in strategic locations," the brown-haired man answered, taking a step back and out of her elbow range.

Ami noted that none of the garments before her would be particularly warm or protective. "Where are the raincoats, winter mantles, thick tunics, and similar things?" Her dungeon heart prohibited the corruption from impeding function, so warm clothes should have been safe. Their absence was unexpected.

"We eliminated those," Jadeite spoke up. "They developed patterns ranging from the obscene to the disgusting and obscene."

"Besides, it's too warm down here for those," Jered added. He stepped up to Cathy's side and rapped his knuckles against her armour. "You better watch out for that pattern effect too, because I don't remember your breastplate starting out with sculpted nipples."

"Oh, you have got to be kidding me!" his girlfriend explained after a look down at herself.

Ami ignored the byplay in favour of paying more attention to Jadeite. His grey uniform was just the right colour to blend in with the walls like some kind of camouflage pattern. "Jadeite, you helped pick out the outfits, then?"

The dark general nodded. Was that a faint blush on his cheeks or just wishful thinking on Ami's part?

Miraculously, the clothes didn't seem so bad any more. Ami reached for a blue dress that looked passable, aside from the vines caressing the chest area. She got the impression that it was one size too small for her, but at least the hem came down lower than on her Sailor Mercury uniform. That slit at the side would probably go up all the way to her waist, though.

"Cathy, what do you think about all of this?" Ami requested an unbiased second opinion.

"About the suggestion or the clothes?" the blond asked. "Jered's idea is unpleasant, but it has a tiny bit of merit. People often try to emulate the ruling classes if they can afford it. As for those..." she gestured at the clothes, nose wrinkled in disdain. "Well, obviously I don't like them. Still, they are comparable to the reaper outfit or your Mercury uniform, and-"

Ami whipped her head sideways and she stared at Cathy with wide eyes. "You seriously think my uniform is similar to the reaper's tiny rags?"

Cathy shrugged. "Well, they are both out of my comfort zone and cover too little."

"But, that..." This vicious slander against Ami's costume had her momentarily speechless. Her uniform certainly wasn't as bad as the things on the table or the demon's garb! Different cultures, she reminded herself. Okay, so what if the skirt was tiny and the rest could masquerade successfully as a swimsuit? It was still much better than- she clenched her teeth when she realised that this description would also fit a few of the outfits she was looking at. "The reaper armour shows a lot more skin than my sailor uniform!" she focused on the core of the issue.

"And yet you have worn them both in public," the swordswoman said, her eyelids half-closed.

Ami couldn't tell if Cathy was arguing seriously or just teasing her at this point. What she could discern was that Jadeite had suddenly looked up and was staring at her, his eyes widened in mild surprise.

"Only in the Underworld!" she hurried to clarify. "It fits right in there!

The denizens would even expect a Keeper to wear something like it!"

"And the civilians here would expect you to be some kind of horrible tyrant who torments and humiliates them for her own amusement," Jered took the opening.

Ami sighed. "All right, you made your point. I'll wear one of them to the meeting."

"Excellent. I suggest this one," Jered said, holding up a two-piece outfit that made Ami blush just looking at it. While its frost flower patterns were very pretty, they were also made of tiny holes in the cloth. In addition, the flimsy thing somehow combined skimpiness with looking as if it would fall apart at the slightest provocation.

"Are you serious? That's the worst of the lot!"

"Not by a long shot. We sorted the really terrible ones out, remember?" Jered said, grinning.

Ami crossed her arms and shot him a dark look. "Please do explain that choice," she said in a freezing tone of voice. "I'm sure that Cathy would love to hear your reasoning, too."

To his credit, Jered didn't so much as flinch under the combined glare of the two females. "That's quite simple, actually. The villagers will accept the tamer designs more easily if they are aware that you could have asked for much worse. They'll be relieved that they won't have to go that far, even!"

"I'm. Not. Wearing. That." Ami stated with finality. Jered's words made a certain twisted sense, but not enough to make her consider being seen in public like that.

"But think of the long term-"

"No! It's too embarrassing!" Ami interrupted.

"General Jadeite, back me up on this!" Jered called out to the man hiding out in a shadowy corner and trying not to be noticed. "What's your opinion?"

Put on the spot like that, the dark general coughed into his hand. "I'm afraid that to outside observers, it will appear as if Mercury is forcing her subjects to wear highly questionable garb. Whether or not she joins in is an unimportant detail of the bigger picture."

"My reputation is ruined," Ami groaned as she buried her head in her hands. She was never going to get rid of those nasty rumours about her at this rate. Why did those stupid dark gods have to give her so much trouble even after their plan had come to naught?

"That doesn't really help me convince her," Jered complained. He turned back to Ami. "Well, actually, it does. I mean, if the reputation damage is pretty much the same either way, then you can commit with no regrets to not coming across as a whimsical tyrant!"

Ami looked at the proffered scraps of fabric again. She tried to imagine herself wearing them, blushed, and vigorously shook her head. "I'd rather wear the reaper armour than that!"

"But-"

"How about I pick from one of those instead?" Ami compromised, pointing at a section of the pile that contained clothes she might actually consider wearing. At a beach. A beach where nobody knew her.

"Not perfect, but it will do," the wavy-haired man said with a smile. "Also, that corruption-made look isn't really fit for an empress. We'll use your choice as a template for the proper costume, so we can make some adjustments."

"There is certainly room for improvement." Ami had no objections against trying to inject as much dignity as possible into this lamentable duty. Getting rid of the frayed seams and using clean, higher-quality cloth would certainly make the garments more presentable.

Jered's mouth widened into a rather smug grin as he collected the pieces Ami had chosen. "Also, did you notice that my suggested plan unquestionably works? I bet you wouldn't have taken any of these into closer consideration before I confronted you with the alternative!"

Ami's fingers twitched in irritation. She took a deep, calming breath and suppressed the sudden urge to throw the heap of so-called clothing at him. "I am going to wear a cloak over it," she declared. "Come up with one that won't deteriorate too much from the corruption!"

"Sure, we can try some work on that too," he agreed and clapped his hands. "That's settled then. When do you want the artisans to be here?"

"Not so fast!" Ami held up a palm. "We have to consider your wardrobe too, after all" she continued sweetly. "I'm not going out like that alone. It's well known that the larger a group of people does something, the more normal it appears!"

"That is, of course, correct," Jered agreed after only a moment of hesitation. "We'll make the necessary arrangements and show-"

"And," Ami pressed on while her annoyance was still giving her enough boldness to do so, "I'm going to pick them out for you!"

Ami's heart hammered in her chest as Jadeite and Jered stared at her like deer in the headlight. In the background, she heard Cathy snickering.

Constructed using white marble from a nearby quarry, the small city and its oracle tower gleamed in the sunlight. Said tower, being the tallest structure for as far as the eye could see, loomed three times higher than the flat roof of the next-tallest building. With the sun low in the sky, its shadow reached out to the untamed savannah just beyond the outermost ring of plantations.

On the wind-swept top of the structure, one male and one female fairy held unto a stone pole inlaid with angular runes. A fresh pair of fairies approached and put their hands on the magic-sucking obsidian. The sweat-drenched initial pair let go, expressions of relief on their faces. Both slumped down on a set of pillows that had been set aside for them, right next to a pitcher filled with cold juice.

Hieron of the Plains, sitting on a disc-shaped platform at the top of the obsidian pole, didn't pay any attention to the activities of the youngsters below. Doing so would be disrespecting their efforts to keep his crystal ball properly powered. Instead, he focused all of his attention on the images within the orb, occasionally moving his gnarled hands to change perspectives.

"Such a crude, ineffective way of scrying," Jogar of the Forests muttered, his ghostly projection hovering above Hieron's shoulder.

The old man didn't look up. "I cannot help it that the dark empress took our embassy staff to a place outside of our range."

"We really should be pressuring her more about finishing the embassy's oracle tower," the higher-ranking seer noted. He glanced at the fairies shown by the crystal ball. "They are within dwarf territory now, are they not?"

"The kingdom of Nimbadnur, to be precise," Hieron said.

"To me, our ambassador does not look too happy about it," Jogar added after a moment.

"She is scowling and shouting at the others, oh masterful expert of body language," Hieron said. "Unless you are also a master of lip-reading, you will not be able to tell me anything new there."

"She is clearly immature if she takes her anger out on her staff," the ghostly oracle commented, "even if her forced relocation is ample reason for a sinister mood. Why do you think the dark empress abandoned her realm in the first place?"

"It's a bit too early to tell. Her hurried departure and the loss of all her claimed territory would suggest bitter defeat," Hieron of the Plains speculated.

"You don't say."

"However, if we look at the bigger picture, it becomes a little harder to tell. Nobody has stepped up to fill the power vacuum on the Avatar Islands. At the very least, she took out her attackers too." Hieron stretched his legs, their joints making soft popping noises. "Now, how many ghosts have you spotted in those wretched wastelands since she left?"

"I haven't been looking for them," Jogar replied, waving his transparent hand dismissively.

"Well, I have, and I haven't found any with a cursory search. It seems that whatever else happened, the undead population of her realm went down dramatically. Perhaps enough to justify the losses she took abandoning the place."

"Are you suggesting that this is simply a part of her longer-term strategy?" Jogar asked, alarmed.

"It's a possibility," Hieron confirmed with a nod. "If she plans to return, then it would be convenient for her if she didn't have to worry about roving swarms of ghosts for decades to come."

"If this move was part of her plans, then the dwarfs are in more danger than we thought. It is about time we warn them about the evil presence within their lands."

Hieron frowned. "That is irregular. Does the Emperor approve?"

"His Imperial Majesty is currently unavailable. He has withdrawn into his inner sanctum, leaving strict orders not to disturb him for anything less than a dire emergency."

"The timing is inconvenient. When will he return from his seclusion?" Hieron asked. It wasn't exactly unusual for powerful magicians to occasionally need peace and quiet for their work. He could feel the magical energies surrounding the Imperial Palace even from here.

"He did not say." Jogar answered, his image shifting sideways.

"Indeed? That is very unusual." Hieron tapped his wrinkled fingers against the crystal ball, which turned black. "I see his tower is active."

"Yes. This decision is one that will be up to the councillors," Jogar said.

"They'll simply follow our advice so they have someone to shift the blame to, as usual," Hieron predicted.

"Naturally. In this particular situation, the dangers of inactions are larger than the potential costs of action. I shall advise them to inform the King of Nimbadnur about the trespassers in his realm."

Last edited: Jul 1, 2016

Bad news

Originally on 2013-07-12T20:17:00

Ami stood amidst piles of clothes scattered across the floor of an otherwise empty chamber. She rested her head on her hands, feeling her cheeks burn underneath her fingers. Why again had she rashly told Jered that she would pick his outfit? Sure, it had been satisfying to see his flabbergasted expression after he had irritated her so, but... She shook her head. The conjured bits and pieces on the ground didn't really deserve to be called "clothes" any longer after the corruption had altered them. If anything, they had turned out worse than the female ones.

Picking from a pile at random, she levitated a collection of thin, belt-like leather straps and turned it in the air before her. She paused in confusion, and her eyes glazed over as she imagined it attached to the male body in various ways to figure out how exactly it was supposed to be worn. Blushing even harder, she let it drop back to the ground. While thinking about Jadeite or even Jered wearing some of this stuff wasn't unpleasant, the implications were mortifying. She'd have to ask them to wear something from this room! Even just thinking about how they'd judge her for her choice felt as if a bucket of cold water had been upended over her head. Sweating, she sighed and nervously looked around once more. She had to find something reasonable. Or at least something that wouldn't make her wish for the ground to swallow her when the time came to present it to its intended wearers.

Ami returned her attention to a section of the room she hadn't surveyed yet. The sight of a pile of items rightfully forgotten by fashion made her whimper, and her remaining resolve abandoned ship. Codpieces.

No. Enough! She wasn't dealing with this! She was an empress, and therefore had other people who could be dealing with this instead! Venna, Eline, I'm going to transport you to me shortly. Get ready, she mentally called out to the two dark elves.

She was confident that with a few precise instructions, they would do a good job. Coming from a culture with questionable fashion trends, they were probably more qualified than her, anyway. The stuff on the ground seemed like the sort of thing that the dark elf tailor who had made her Keeper uniform had initially tried to foist on her.

Ami wrinkled her nose and looked at her gold-trimmed black sleeve. Said uniform was getting a noticeably uncomfortable in this underground heat, and it was also feeling a little tight. She suspected the latter had more to do with her being a growing girl than with any detrimental corruption effects, though. She decided that she would change into something else as soon as she had briefed Eline and Venna.

Count Ornish rushed past a line of busts depicting his liege's ancestors, sparing no glance at their marble-sculpted features. His attention remained focused on the wide-open doorway at the end of the corridor.

A young dwarven lad in the livery of a messenger appeared between the iron wings of the door and left the room at a jog. He politely inclined his head toward Ornish as he passed him.

The count returned the greeting with a barely-perceptible nod and continued onwards. The guards in front of the door, clad entirely in gleaming plate and leaning on their war mauls, waved him through without hesitation.

Inside the room, Duke Libasheshtan stood behind a table covered in maps. He was talking rapidly to the captain of the cities' militia, his black beard bobbing up and down. The arsenal master was hovering around the two, wringing his hands, while the duke's champion contemplated the map.

A large monster of a wolfhound was the first to notice Ornish' arrival and wagged his tail before he returned his attention to gnawing on a bone.

"My Liege, I have arrived as soon as I could," Ornish announced himself

"Ah, Count," the Duke said as he turned and shook the other dwarf's hand. A brief but sincere smile flickered over his futures before his deep frown returned."Old friend, I'm sorry to interrupt your and your wife's visit to my city, but I have grave news concerning your County."

"The orcs are amassing for an invasion?" Ornish guessed. Glancing at the map, he had no trouble recognising his home terrain under the light of the runes winding around the chamber's pillars

"If only," the Duke shook his head sadly. "This situation is much worse. Our King has informed me that the Dark Empress herself has established a foothold in the Barony of Whitemountains."

Ornish felt his hackles rise. A Keeper was no laughing matter, and this one was particularly problematic. "How accurate is that information?" he asked tersely.

"We were warned about her presence by two independent sources. Preliminary scrying has revealed odd storm patterns around Highroot mountain, hinting at a dungeon in the area," the Duke elaborated, pointing at a white-patterned area on the map.

Ornish swore loud enough to make the dog in the corner start and whine. "Highroot. That's undeveloped area. Good, since it's away from my people, bad because it will take longer to get our troops over there."

"Do not fear, all of Nimbadnur will stand with you against this danger," Duke Libasheshtan assured him. "I have already ordered five hundred of my city guards to accompany you on your way home. Likewise, you will soon receive reinforcements from my other vassals, and eventually all of the kingdom."

"They cannot arrive quickly enough," Ornish said, his mind racing. He could personally call upon about one thousand dwarfs, and each of his three barons on a little under that. If he could bring all of his forces to bear at once, it might be enough for the task at hand. Of course, that would mean the survivors would be returning to homes raided and pillaged by the ever-vigilant orc tribes. Still, the Duke's assistance almost doubled the number of professional warriors he commanded, which would help a great deal with the morale of the rest.

"Contain her where she is, and they will be there in time!" Libasheshtan said with conviction. "No foul Keeper shall divide our lands again!"

"As you command, my liege." Buying time was something he felt able to handle. His miners and engineers could compete with the best.

"I shall be joining you about one week from now with veterans recalled from the outlying towns and villages," the Duke promised. "In the meantime, Toltotbom here-"

The captain of the guard bowed.

"- will be training more militia."

Toltotbom snorted. "About a month for now, they'll still not be good for much more than garrison duty, but-"

"That will free the bulk of our forces from their current duties," Ornish finished. If the other dukes handled matters similarly, then their forces would be arriving soon after. A different worry kept occupying his thoughts. "What if the Dark Empress shows herself?"

"Our loyalty to the King will see us through," the Duke said. "She has no legitimate claim to the throne, unlike the pretender."

"May he enjoy the fruits of his actions in the afterlife." Ornish turned towards the door. "By your leave? I have a home to protect."

"Go with all haste, Count, and may we all enjoy hearing the bards sing about our victory in the not too far future!"

Darkness reigned within Ami's new office, contested only by the candelabras placed on the four corners of her desk. The desk itself was a partially hollowed-out rock block so large that they were well outside of her reach. She would have to climb on top of it and crawl across its glass-covered surface to be in any danger of accidentally toppling one of the lights. As the rest of her office matched the desk's scale, the candlelight failed to reach the walls, leaving the bookshelves lining them them shrouded in darkness.

Ami pushed back her chair, making a scraping noise that echoed in the vast, almost empty chamber. She didn't need her eyes to see within her dungeon, but right now, she was using entirely mundane senses to check if visitors would see anything they shouldn't. In theory, the darkness would hide the fact that her office - size aside - wasn't exactly fit for an empress. She didn't see much use in expending time and resources on ostentatious decorations when the corruption would just ruin them soon. For the moment, she had simply covered every exposed stone surface in a layer of glass to create an illusion of sophistication. Hopefully, it would also encourage any modifications to develop along the lines of fragility and her own ice themes.

So far, that scheme had mostly gained her damp walls.

Well, closer inspection also revealed tiny fractures within the glass that reflected the dim light, arranged in glittering constellations that resembled frost flowers. Ami deemed this a more favourable result than she had any reason to expect.

She stepped around her desk and focused her attention on its front. To her satisfaction, the Mercury symbol emblazoned onto its solid front remained yet untainted by the corruption.

Now that she had verified that there was nothing in the room that would embarrass her in front of visitors, Ami focused on her connection to her dungeon heart. Guided by her intent, a square section of the floor shattered, its tiles coming loose and evaporating into blue smoke. Drawing upon the prison blueprint, Ami made vertical steel bars grow from the ground in a square pattern. She briefly transported herself into the cell and tried to cast spells outside, but they didn't get through the spaces between the bars. Good, the cage was safe. Invoking her Keeper transport again, Ami reappeared behind her desk.

Confident that no tentacle monsters, goblins, or buckets full of dirty water were around, she transported the captured enemy sorceress into her office.

A slender woman with long, black hair dropped onto the straw-covered ground behind the bars and let out a startled gasp. With a snake-like twist of her body, she catapulted herself back into upright position, landing in a defensive crouch.

Ami's eyes widened as she noticed the prisoner's dress. The slinky thing consisted mostly of loose strips of cloth that barely covered the essentials - before it had taken battle damage.

The woman spun around, squinting against the light of the torches affixed to her cell as she took in her new surroundings. Her garment waved from her rapid motion, revealing that she was unlikely to be wearing anything else.

Flushing, Ami kept her gaze firmly on the knot that kept a snapped shoulder strap together, and she dropped one of her cloaks into the cell.

By now, the magician had turned to face Ami, or at least her desk. She flinched when the cloak appeared before her, and a pink light flickered briefly over her fingertips. It died down almost immediately, and she snatched the flowing garment out of the air and draped it around herself. Now properly covered, she sank to one knee and inclined her head. "Her Imperial Majesty, Empress Mercury I presume?"

"Yes," Ami replied in a neutral voice, standing up. "And you are?"

"My name is Monteraine," the sorceress introduced herself. "Head - or rather, former head of Morrigan's warlocks."

"Morrigan?" Ami asked quietly, needing a moment to connect the name with the Keeper who had - briefly - interfered with her invasion of the Avatar Islands. "He is the one whose attack distracted Zarekos, right? So that was him with that flying dungeon."

"Yes. Keeper Morrigan, ardent worshipper of Azzathra," Monteraine elaborated. "Given his lamentable choice of a deity, it should be immediately obvious that he would only hire magic users whose skills were valuable enough to overcome his distaste for them."

Ami considered this.

Monteraine took her silence as an invitation to keep talking. "Frankly, I am surprised that your Majesty did not choose to question me about him earlier."

Morrigan had not made it onto the list of urgent issues Ami was concerned about even before Jadeite had kicked him off the Avatar Islands. "He slipped my mind," she admitted. "It's not as if he has made much of a lasting impression so far."

Monteraine stared at her, blinking once before she remembered to close her mouth. " Forgive my insolence, your Majesty, but how can you say that?" Her voice grew a little lower, as if she wasn't entire sure that continuing her current line of reasoning was wise. "He cost you a dungeon heart, your Imperial Majesty!"

Ami shook her head. "I was planning to abandon that dungeon anyway, and all he did was make me speed up my plans," she explained. "His presence was rather helpful, actually, since it let me get rid of all of those ghosts at once."

"You are saying that he was merely collateral damage?" Monteraine asked, sounding mildly irritated.

Ami narrowed her eyes at her. "Is there a problem with that?"

The woman shrank away from the bars and inclined her head more deeply. "Of course not, your Majesty. I was merely- well, I was expecting such an unusual and original angle of attack to be more than a little inconvenience, even for you!"

She almost sounded cheated, Ami thought. Monteraine's praise for the plan was odd too, given that she had only mentioned Morrigan with slight disdain until now. "Oh! It was your idea, wasn't it?"

Monteraine twitched, and a few beads of sweat glittered on her forehead. "You are very perceptive, your Imperial Majesty. I'm, err, of course not disappointed that I failed to harm you," she hastened to clarify. "It's only that such abject failure stings my professional pride a little."

"Sorry? I'm sure it would have given me some trouble if I hadn't been preparing to move," Ami found herself consoling the sorceress. Perhaps that was because her hairstyle reminded her a little of Rei?

Monteraine coughed into her hand. "Um. Well, you are not at all what I expected, your Imperial Majesty. I had not taken you for an admirer of the Shining Concord's style, for example," she finished with a light questioning tone.

Ami had ordered a replica of the fairies' outfit from blue cloth from her trolls, and it fit her quite well. If the swimsuit-like uniform was used by a nation's military, she had convinced herself, then it could hardly be considered indecent. No matter what it looked like. "It has some practical advantages," Ami replied.

"Indubitably," Monteraine agreed in a dry voice.

Ami got the sinking feeling that the sorceress was not thinking about how suitable it was for the hot underground climate. Or that the corruption was unlikely to eat away at it. Or even how it was mental preparation for Ami's other performance today. "In any case, I brought you here to decide what to do about you," she said in an effort to get back on track.

"You could hire me, your Imperial Majesty,"Monteraine suggested immediately. "I assure you that I am a sorceress of rare creativity and skill. I do feel inspired by your work with three-dimensional wards, even if my own research has not yet managed to catch up."

Ami blinked at that, having no idea what Monteraine was talking about. It did sound like something that could be potentially of interest, though.

"Obviously, since Morrigan and you share similar interests, much of my knowledge and experience could also be applied in your service without major modifications."

"How so?" Ami asked, dreading the answer. From her short conversations with Morrigan's former minions, she had gathered that he was as horrible a deviant as she was rumoured to be.

"I'm very good at making improvements. Morrigan certainly did not gain his huge, sculpted body and his good looks through diligent training and a healthy diet." She hesitated for a moment, scrutinizing Ami more closely. "However, I can see that bulging muscles are not necessarily something you would want for yourself, your Majesty. Fortunately, I have improvements more suitable for the female body in my repertoire too." She raised her hands and moved them in a curving gesture through the air. "Perhaps you would like me to help along your body's development a little?"

Ami wondered when exactly she had lost control of the conversation. Not that the notion of improving her looks wasn't tempting, as Jadeite might appreciate- what was she thinking? This wasn't the time to get distracted by her hormones! "Um, I'm not certain I'd want to make use of those skills at all," she muttered and sank deeper into her chair.

Her protest didn't distract Monteraine from her sales pitch. "Understandable. Naturally, you needn't only take my word for it. If you want to inspect some of my work more closely-"

"Stop! Put that back on!" Ami shouted, covering her eyes as Monteraine began to slid out of her cloak.

"As you wish," the sorceress acquiesced, sounding surprised. There was a rustle of cloth as she recovered her clothing and and wrapped it around herself. "A-as I was about to explain, I have made various rather skilful adjustments to myself. Properly matching volume and skin elasticity, for example, is-"

Someone knocked at the door. "Your Majesty? We need you to approve the selection we made!" a female voice called from outside, accompanied by a suppressed giggle.

Ami glanced past Monteraine at the entrance. That would be Venna and Eline then, a little ahead of schedule. She called "Enter!" almost before she had consciously realised how much she wanted a break from Monteraine's antics.

Eline's slim, pointy-eared silhouette appeared in the brightly-lit gap as she opened the tall door. Carrying a tray loaded with clothes, the albino entered, followed by the curvier form of Venna. Both of the dark elves hesitated in the entrance as their eyes adjusted to the darkness.

Ami glanced at their trays with one half curiosity and one half worry. Had they managed to find something reasonable? Before she could check, tray and contents clattered to the floor.

"You!" Eline hissed, red eyes widening in recognition as she stared at the figure within the cage.

"Hmm?" Monteraine turned to face her. "It's imprudent to point at people who can turn you into a rock with a few words."

"Shut up!" the dark elf shouted as she stalked towards the bars, producing a dagger from somewhere within her trousers. She whirled towards Ami and dropped to one knee. "My Empress, can I have her? Please?"

"What? No!" Ami answered, blinking at the usually placid woman whose fingers were clenching and unclenching. A quick glance behind the dark elf revealed that Venna was glowering at the sorceress too. "Explain!" she demanded, still surprised by the sudden hostility.

"She's was the one in charge of breaking minions to suit Morrigan's whims!" Eline snarled and clenched her teeth.

Ami's heart skipped a beat. With the way Monteraine was dressed, she hadn't expected that. "You mean like..." Ami threw a significant glance in Venna's direction.

Eline nodded, making a growling sound in the back of her throat.

"Monteraine, is that true?"

Monteraine had followed Ami's gaze to the large-chested dark elf and therefore missed the Keeper's eyes flaring brighter. "That? Oh, yes. Morrigan's too impatient and makes nothing but a terrible mess with my spells more often than not." She frowned at Venna's clingy dress. "She looks vaguely familiar, but- Aha! Someone undid my work? Impressive. It's supposed to be permanent."

"You bitch!" Eline snarled. "I'll gut you like-"

"Eline, stop!" Ami shouted as the dark elf lunged towards the bars.

The albino froze and somehow managed to pale further upon seeing Ami's displeased expression."Y-yes your Majesty."

"I will not let my employees kill each other over past grievances," Ami proclaimed quickly, trying to get some time to think.

"Not a minion yet," Eline mumbled in protested, barely audible.

"What about just a little stabbing instead?" Venna suggested cheerfully. "Let her exercise her spells that prevent scarring."

Ami found herself seriously considering the notion for a split-second. Appalled, she clamped down on her anger for Monteraine, caused by the sorceress complete disregard for her victim. She shook her head. "Neither will I tolerate them harming each other." Then, she looked directly at the sorceress. "Nor will I let those grievances remain unaddressed."

"Perfectly reasonable," Monteraine agreed. "Infighting is such a bother. Just leave the two of them to me for an hour, and they won't even remember they were ever angry at me."

Feeling sickened by sorceress' approval-seeking smile, Ami glared at her. "That would most definitely be harming them!" She took a deep breath. "Monteraine, I am convinced by now that you are not prospective hireling material."

The black-haired woman recoiled as if slapped. "What? But your Majesty! You can't be serious! I'm too valuable to kill! I- I have different skills too! I'm m-multi-talented, really!" Monteraine stammered. She swallowed when she saw the huge grin on Eline's face. "I can be useful!"

Lack of skills wasn't the problem, unfortunately. Ami's sense of justice was screaming at her to punish the sorceress. At the same time, it was complaining about only punishing evildoers when their victims made her aware of their crimes. Not that she had much choice in the matter. Pragmatically speaking, she couldn't afford to investigate the past of her underlings if she didn't want to get rid of most of them. Ami grimaced. She hated having to make excuses like that to herself. At which point would she go too far and become part of the system?

"He's not back yet - shouldn't be back yet!" Monteraine shouted, her voice getting shriller. "Morrigan, I mean. You could strike right now! I can find his dungeons for you!"

Ami listened up. Getting rid of an enemy Keeper was worth her while, even if Morrigan had been something of an involuntary asset so far."Why did you work for someone like him anyway?" she asked. Knowing the black-haired woman's motives would make it easier to decide what to do with her.

"It's not as if I had much choice!" the sorceress blurted out, some confidence returning. "You don't think he uses his spells only on his toys, do you? Or that I could have just walked out on him? He's worshipping Azzathra!" She took a deep breath. "If you are a warlock and he wants something from you, you had better damn well give it to him! And if you can't..." she looked at the floor. "Suffice it to say that these last few weeks where he demanded that we recreate your Majesty's achievements were extremely unpleasant."

"Serves you right," Venna hissed in the back.

Ami felt less inclined to share the dark elf's sentiment now. She knew all too well what it was like to be stuck within circumstances that sharply limited one's options. However, there was Monteraine's complete lack of regret... Argh, how was she supposed to do what was right? "Monteraine, tell me what you know about Morrigan. If your information is accurate and useful, I will hire you."

"Thank you for that chance to prove myself, your Majesty," Monteraine said while bowing.

Ami could hear Eline grind her teeth. "However, your wages will go to your past victims as compensation," Ami continued.

Monteraine's face fell. "That's - that is -"

"Would you prefer it if they took it out of your hide instead?" Ami interrupted sharply. "This way, at least, you'll be worth more alive to them than dead."

"I see your point, your Majesty," Monteraine said, glancing over at the two glowering dark elves.

Venna leaned over and whispered something into Eline's ear, making the shorter woman smirk.

Ami didn't catch the words that were exchanged, but decided that she'd need to keep an eye on that situation. If she kept Monteraine, anyway. Addressing the sorceress again, she said "Now, I want to hear about Morrigan's lairs. Right after you have turned my vampire whom you petrified back to normal."

Last edited: Jul 1, 2016

Delivering Presents

Originally on 2013-08-08T03:05:00

Monteraine descended the winding staircase, hating every moment of it. She hated that the steps were so tall she had to sit down and let her legs dangle over the edge. She hated how the cold stone scraped her skin when she gave herself a push and slid down onto the next step. She hated how every such slide brought her closer to Morrigan's dungeon, and she especially hated that she couldn't loudly curse the one responsible for this.

Tiny rodent claws pricked her neck as the dark empress held on tighter, hidden underneath the sorceress' long hair.

Monteraine shivered and bit her tongue. Voicing her annoyance would be suicidal. Instead, she continued counting the steps. By her count, she should be arriving at the bottom any moment now. That meant that a few metres below her, the walls retreated to form a large cavern, leaving the impractical staircase standing free like a pillar in its centre. She pre-emptively started hating how exposed that would leave her to the crossbowwomen stationed behind the arrow slits in the cavern walls. Dark elves or not, Monteraine doubted they would be able to correctly tell friend from foe in the light of the single torch on the bottom.

She took a deep breath shouted "Head warlock Monteraine approaching! If any bolts happen to accidentally fly my way, I'll make your digestive tract operate in reverse from now on!" There. She had announced herself, and now only needed to worry about being shot intentionally. Somehow, that was less reassuring than she would have liked.

"...that even mean?" a female orcish voice drifted up from below.

"...means you'd have to stuff food up your..." another woman explained, not loud enough for Monteraine to catch everything.

"Sounds like her all right," the first voice declared.

"Could you really do that?" the dark empress voice appeared in Monteraine's mind, sounding a little queasy.

"Probably," Monteraine answered, keeping her voice low. "Flipping the whole squishy mess around and reattaching the tubes and rewiring the nerves should do it," she added, more focused on getting safely down the final steps than on analysing the problem. She peered around the circular chamber, looking for the entrance to the dungeon. Even in the dark, she had no trouble finding it. Morrigan had heard of subtlety but saw little reason to apply it. He liked building big. Big rock blocks, big statues, big pillars, or in this case, a big entrance gate.

Nervously, Monteraine approached the solid metal portcullis that was at least four times her height and stared up at the balcony above it. Would acid come pouring down on her from the grate-covered openings underneath it? "Well, what are you waiting for? Let me in!"

"The door would open automatically for minions," the same female voice who had explained things to the orc commented, sounding suspicious.

Monteraine heard the sounds of crossbows being cranked, and her heart rate quickened. She could feel the mouse on her shoulder go still. "Which obviously means that I need to be re-hired, having been too close to the Master's dungeon heart when it was destroyed," she answered, managing to sound dismissive. "You did notice that he is currently banished, right?"

"Yeah, we aren't stupid," the unseen dark elf replied. "What happened over there, anyway?"

Monteraine shrugged. "Big explosions and vampires. It was a trap and pretty much over before we could do something about it."

"How'd you get back here, then?" the orc asked, sounding more curious than clever. "The Avatar Islands are pretty far away."

"I beat down a vampire, forced it into bat form and turned it big enough to ride," Monteraine lied easily, knowing very well that Morrigan didn't hire minions who were knowledgeable enough to spot any of the impossibilities in that statement. She scratched her chin.

"I'm surprised that you bothered to come back at all," the dark elf said, her voice smug. "If I had as many failures under my belt, I'd have been smart enough to avoid this place."

The orc chuckled as if her companion had said something funny.

"What, and lose all of my research notes?" Monteraine shouted, crossing her arms. "That's crazy."

"Magicians. They are all screwed up in the head," the dark elf muttered.

Monteraine decided to hurt her if she got the opportunity. She was getting rather tired of talking at a door. "Enough inane questions. Take me to the heart already!" she demanded. "The Master will be expecting my report the moment he returns!"

"Gulba, start cranking," the orc ordered after a moment of silence.

"Damn, why me? You are stronger than me!" the elven woman answered.

"Exactly!" the orc replied in a tone that left no doubt that she was grinning. "Get to work!"

Judging from the declining volume of the elf woman's curses, she was moving away. A moment later, the portcullis started to rise at an agonisingly low pace.

Monteraine waited, her apprehension rising along with the gate. Her thoughts were returning again and again to her job interview an hour ago. She had managed to fast-talk herself out of trouble, but that had been more luck than planning. She lacked vital information about Mercury's quirks and pet issues. How was she supposed to lie convincingly when she didn't know what she needed to lie about in the first place? Damn it, the gate was already open.

Monteraine stepped forward, hoping desperately she wouldn't run into any talkative acquaintances. They might say things that didn't mesh with her somewhat misleading presentation of her situation under Morrigan.

Ami hid behind Monteraine's neck from the four orcs escorting the sorceress deeper into the dungeon. With every jostling step, her paws threatened to come loose from the strap of the woman's dress, and the hair tickling Ami's nose made her want to sneeze. She suppressed the urge and kept very still, watching her environment. Through the curtain of Monteraine's long black hair, she caught glimpses of wide, artless pillars tinted orange by the light from fire pits and coal-filled pots.

"So, Monty, Julur has been rifling through your stuff while you were gone," one of the orcs said.

Ami peered at the speaker. The pinkish creature was wearing an outfit that resembled Monteraine's, made of loose strips of black cloth, but it failed to cover her chest. Perhaps she didn't see much use for modesty because Morrigan hired almost exclusively female minions? Curious about the differences between orc and human anatomy, Ami took a closer look. What she saw reminded her of an obese human male torso, but more leathery and pinker. She quickly averted her gaze from the unpleasant sight. Morrigan had some decidedly odd tastes if he forced everyone to dress up like that.

"I don't care. That moron isn't bright enough to do anything with it," Monteraine grumbled, frowning and keeping her gaze straight ahead.

The orc grinned and added in a teasing voice "That so? He's been crowing about how he's finally going to have your job now that he has proof-" She made a wet gurgling noise, and her white mane shook as she coughed violently, trying to clear her throat. She stopped, droplets of greenish froth shooting from her mouth. They splattered on the floor, adding the smell of vomit to the ambient aroma of sweat and burning coal.

Monteraine let the hand raised in the coughing woman's direction drop. "Lirne, If I wanted to hear more about someone who doesn't concern me, then I would ask. Now kindly shut up, I have important issues to think about."

The orc wiped her lips clean and glowered. "Fuck you! I hope the Master fires you anyway for screwing up again!"

Pressed up against the sorceress' carotid, Ami could feel the woman's pulse rate spike. Her calm, superior demeanour was only a mask, then. The deception was working on the orcs, though, as they were keeping a greater distance from Monteraine. Ami was a little impressed herself. She would be hard-pressed to cast a debilitating spell that quickly even with the dungeon heart backing her up. Whatever Monteraine was hiding from Morrigan, it certainly wasn't a lack of skill. It was too bad that the orcs seemed too intimidated to continue chatting.

As the small group moved on in uneasy silence, Ami had nothing to distract herself from paying attention to her surroundings. She almost fell from Monteraine's shoulder when she spotted a crude statue - both in craftsmanship and motif. It depicted the entwined bodies of an elf and a bile demon, both unclothed. Even that short glimpse made Ami doubt that the depraved activity they were engaged in was anatomically possible, enjoyable, or even survivable.

Turning her attention to the walls only brought marginal reprieve from the tasteless deviance. The imp-made engravings had nudity and intertwined bodies too, but they were more stylized and alternated with gory battle scenes. Ami winced a little when she spotted an engraving that mixed both themes. She winced again when she remembered that her own dungeon's décor was headed in a similar direction, minus the glorification of violence. She really needed to stop that in its tracks. In the meantime, she kept her gaze fixated on the least offensive sights in this place. Surprisingly enough, those were the inhabitants in their barely-there outfits.

Through an open doorway, Ami could see a bunch of creatures of various races lifting weights, their skins gleaming in the light of the torches. The dark elves and humans among them certainly did have the athletic physiques required to make the oiled-up barbarian look work. The resulting aesthetics weren't all bad, she admitted to herself. Perhaps that was an option for her own people if she wanted to make the best of a bad situation? No, most of them weren't anywhere near fit enough to wear clothes like that with dignity. She shook her head sadly, tickling Monteraine in the process and causing her to twitch. None of the guards commented on it, fortunately.

About fifteen minutes of quiet walk through winding tunnels later, the group came to a stop in a large hall. By now, Ami had resigned herself to the fact she wasn't going to learn anything useful from this expedition. She had also come to the conclusion that Morrigan's antics were to blame for the fact that people were so willing to believe any silly rumours about her supposed deviance. Oh yes, she was greatly looking forward to what she was about to do to him.

Monteraine stopped in front of what looked like a solid wall and whirled around to face her escort "Finally. Now go, fetch me a chair, a desk, paper and ink so I can begin my report, then stay here!"

"You can sit on the floor you uppity bitch! What do we look like, imps?" Lirne snapped.

"You aren't even a minion right now. You are in no position to give us orders," the largest of the pinkish women said, a little more calmly.

"I'll be again soon enough," the sorceress answered, making a dismissive gesture. "Now hurry up, I don't want to be here unprepared when the Master returns from his banishment."

"Yeah, no. You only want a few warm bodies between you and his anger when he arrives. We are out of here! Have fun! Not!"

"Shouldn't we keep an eye on her?" the smallest of the orcs asked as the other three moved toward the stone archway leading out.

The largest orc stopped. "Yes, clearly she's going to dig through sixteen cubits of near-indestructible rock, avoid the alarms, and attack the dungeon heart by herself, all without anybody noticing," she said sneering. "Just to be clear, that means 'no', 'you are a moron', and 'that's their job'." She pointed up at a crenellated balcony.

Ami followed the pointed digit and spotted two dark elves standing motionless in the shadows.

"You don't have to be an arsehole about it!" the cautious orc complained as she hurried after the others.

Monteraine leaned against the wall, facing away from the guards on the balcony, and waited in silence. A few minutes after the footsteps of the orcs had faded in the distance, she asked in a barely audible whisper "Now what, your Imperial Majesty? We are as alone as we are going to get."

Ami had already been told that Morrigan's protections for his dungeon heart were as simplistic as they were effective. Sticking with his preferences, he had built big. The wall Monteraine was leaning against was actually a gate the size and volume of a small house, fortified by imps. As if that wasn't enough, seven metal clamps locked it in place, each one operated by a lever in a different and remote part of the dungeon. Unfortunately, Morrigan hadn't neglected to make the rest of the walls just as solid as the entrance. The dungeon heart itself, directly behind the gate, prevented spellcasting or teleportation into its chamber. All in all, the security measures would successfully prevent forceful intrusion until help could arrive.

"We break in," Ami answered telepathically. "First, I will have to neutralise the guards."

"Please do remember that alarms will go off if someone who isn't meant to be here touches the ground," Monteraine whispered back.

"Thanks for the reminder. Please hold me so I don't fall," Ami requested. "I'll need my front paws free for this."

Monteraine grabbed the mouse on her shoulder, making it look as if she was brushing through her hair. She interposed her body between herself and the rodent, helping the latter to stand on its hind legs by holding it up with two fingers.

Ami's whiskers twitched as she concentrated and moved her forelegs through the air. Casting a spell undetected was difficult enough when you had the appropriate limbs. Proceeding cautiously, she projected an energy-draining spell at the dark elves, going slowly and alternating between the two.

It didn't take long for the first of the white-skinned women to lean heavily on the crenelations. The other was in no shape to notice, as she was unable to keep her eyes eyelids from closing.

Ami intensified the drain, and the albinos slumped over in quick succession. "The guards are unconscious," she informed Monteraine. "I am going to create an imp. Stand ready to catch her."

A flash of green motes later, the sorceress staggered from the impact of a coverall-clad large-eyed creature landing in her arms.

The imp giggled as Ami raced up Monteraine's arm, ordered the mouse to stay put, and turned into an arc of black lightning. She struck the worker between her bulbous black eyes, which lit up with a red light.

The imp flashed blue for an instant, and Monteraine blinked repeatedly. Her mouth opened half-way as she stared at the tiara, the black leotard, and the extremely short blue skirt the imp was now wearing.

"Shabon Spray Freezing!" Ami said in a low, squeaky voice, thrusting her three-fingered hands towards the ground. With the stream of fog-filled bubbles that shot from her palms, she coated the floor in a thin layer of ice. Belatedly, she noticed that she had not needed to cast the spell slowly to gather the required power. "It should be safe to let me down now, since I won't be touching the ground directly," she said.

Monteraine complied a little too quickly, almost dropping Ami. "I am eager to see how we are going to get past the defences, your Majesty," she whispered, leaning in closer. "Preferably without alerting announcing your presence to the rest of the dungeon," she added, looking over her shoulder at the doorway.

Ami summoned her visor and observed the metal clamps hidden within the rock. "I think it will be easiest to just open the door the way it is meant to open, more or less," she answered. "Please retreat to the far wall for your own safety."

Monteraine obeyed without hesitation, not taking her eyes off Ami as she created a large metal bar with her fabrication spell and levitated it in front of herself.

Ami used a second instance of the spell to wrap the bar with coil. Now she only needed to add a little Keeper lightning and she had a workable electromagnet. Just like- eek!

Startled, Ami jumped back and slipped on the ice when something struck her magnet with a loud clang. The dark elves' crossbow bolts, she realised as she picked herself off the floor. With bated breath, she listened for approaching footsteps or cries of alarm, but everything remained silent. Phew. She risked returning to work, directing an encouraging smile at the pale Monteraine.

With the aid of her visor, she tracked the first clamp inside the rock while she manipulated it with her magnet. Click. Easy enough. She was vaguely aware of Monteraine craning her neck and frowning as she watched, a baffled expression on her face. It quickly turned to amazement as six more clicks followed the first one in rapid succession, indicating that the clamps were loose.

"Your Majesty, that was amazing! What kind of unlocking wand can work that close to a dungeon heart?"

"Later," Ami said, dismissing the conjured object and dissolving it into a storm of green sparks. "That large wheel over there is what the minions use to lift the gate?" She pointed at a round, horizontal contraption that had many grips sticking out at waist height.

"Indeed, Empress. It takes almost half of the dungeon's inhabitants to turn it. Even Morrigan's Keeper power is too weak by itself," she pointed out.

"That's helpful to know," Ami muttered. Undeterred, she summoned fog and condensed it into a Keeper hand. Missing strength could be compensated for by using pulleys and counterweights, which were only a few fabrication spells away.

Monteraine watched the possessed imp work, alternating between gaping and frowning. "This... this is not what I expected," she commented when the wheel slowly creaked into motion, pulled by the frozen Keeper hand and an assortment of hastily-conjured tools. "It's ingenious but mundane."

"It works and it's subtle," Ami answered while the heavy gate rose millimetre by millimetre. She stopped when the gap underneath it was high enough to accommodate an imp. Again, she froze the ground to circumvent the alarms, and then created another imp.

The creature held out an open bag in front of Ami, who moved her hands over the opening. Dark-coloured dust trickled into the container, rapidly filling it. Once it was full, the imp hurried through the tunnel to the enemy dungeon heart, emptied the sack into its pit, and returned.

Monteraine watched the imp come and go several times before she approached, the ice under her feet cracking slightly. "May I ask what you are doing, your Majesty?"

"Are you familiar with black powder?" Ami answered.

"One of the many means alchemists blow themselves up with, yes," Monteraine confirmed, glancing at the empty bag of the returning imp. "Oh." She took a step back from the creature. "I suppose that will work, in sufficient amounts." She backed off a little further.

"Exactly." Ami shook her head at the imp when the servant waited for her with the empty sack again. "No, we are done here."

"We are?" Monteraine asked, raising an eyebrow as Ami started dissolving her conjured tools.

"Yes." Ami closed her eyes and mentally called out to the youma Umbra back at her home base. "You have been tracking us, correct? Bring the body, but don't touch the ground."

A pillar of darkness appeared in the room just as the gate leading to Morrigan's dungeon heart slammed shut, causing Monteraine to jump. "She's here to transport us back?" she asked when Umbra, wrapped in her customary robes, appeared from the fading column of shadows. It took the sorceress a moment to spot the burnt human figure the youma was carrying. "Is that supposed to be me?"

Ami nodded, sickened by the smell of burnt flesh despite knowing that it wasn't real. She quickly looked away. The corpse was a duplicate of herself, made with the same glamour spell she had used to trick Crowned Death. Wearing a replica of Monteraine's dress and then burned beyond recognition, it should keep the locals distracted with a murder mystery long enough that the rest of Ami's plan could fall into place.

"A bit short if that is supposed to be me," Monteraine noted. "Though I suppose the orcs are dumb enough to miss that detail. I confess that I'm still a little confused as to why you didn't destroy the dungeon yet?"

"There is a lightning trap down there with the black powder," Ami explained. "Once the heart starts beating again-"

"Boom. That's brilliant," Monteraine finished, clapping her hands. "The moment Morrigan returns, he is banished once more, and there's nothing he can do about it. You might even kill him if he reappears at this particular heart! How delightfully spiteful, your Majesty!"

"It will keep him out of my way for a while longer, in any case," Ami answered. Hopefully, she would be able to deal the time gained to deal with some of the other issues plaguing her. Issues that were more pressing than attacking his better-defended dungeons. "Now, Monteraine, since your information was good, I will hold up my end of the bargain and hire you. I think I even have a project where your particular skills will come in useful. Umbra, teleport us home!"

Monteraine stared at her so-called research assistant, wondering if the Dark Empress was still testing her.

Noticing her attention, the tentacle monster waved a few of its appendages.

"You are the one who has experience with hybridization and body parts attached to unusual places?" she verified, staring straight into two of the creature's eyes.

"I'm afraid so," Tserk answered. "Uncomfortable, personal experience."

Monteraine sighed and stomped on a tentacle that had been snaking in her direction. "You will have to tell me all about it in exhaustive detail. Later." Her gaze came to rest on a row of cages filled with rats. She sighed again. "For now, make yourself useful and start shaving the test subjects."

Unexpected Visitors (DARK)

Originally on 2013-08-31T17:10:00

Dolzene threw herself flat to the ground and grunted when her chin hit the rock. A spiny, hook-covered limb whipped through the space she had just occupied, passing close enough that she could feel the air moving in its wake. Pushing with one arm, she flipped herself on her side and pointed her free hand at the monstrosity looming over her, twice as tall as she was. Her open palm glowed blue as she lifted, and the beast's four hind legs lost contact with the ground.Unable to advance, the scaled monster reached for her, multi-jointed limbs flailing and grasping.

Dolzene crawled backwards, the arm pointing at her attacker wavering under the strain of keeping the heavy creature afloat. "Kuzza, kill it! Kill it before it spits acid! Kuzza!" she shouted, her voice shrill and high-pitched. Still backing away, she risked a brief glance over her shoulder, searching for the other youma. Finger-long insect remains dotted the landscape like glowing coals, burning with a ghostly white flame. "Damn it, Kuzza, hurry!"

A head with green flame for hair popped out from a ditch behind Dolzene. "I can't! The big ones don't burn!" Kuzza complained, her wide-open eyes never lingering on one point for more than an instant.

Dolzene cursed. "Then get up there and hit it with a rock!" she jerked her head in the direction of the cliff face looming behind them. Above it, endless flashes of lightning illuminated a buzzing black cloud that blotted out the sky.

Kuzza looked upwards, her expression dubious. One of the dead insects raining like embers from above almost hit her in the eye. Flinching, she ducked and created a white-glowing sphere between her hands. She jumped, her mineral skin gleaming almost exactly like the shells of the invaders in the light of the humming sphere at her side. Like the spells already up in the air, it lashed any bug that got too close with lightning. Protected by the crackling sphere, Kuzza squatted down next to a boulder and wrapped her arms around it. Grunting with effort, she heaved it up to chest height, spun around her own axis for momentum, and hurled it down the cliff.

The plummeting boulder would miss, Dolzene realized. The muscles in her arm screamed in pain as she yanked it to the side, dragging the levitating monstrosity into the path of the falling boulder.

With a resounding crack, the rock struck the hunching monster's neck. Shell fragments went flying, and the creature's head came off as if hit by a guillotine. Slumping, the body crashed to the ground.

Dolzene hadn't aimed for the neck, but she wasn't questioning the bout of good luck. She turned away from the grotesque corpse when she heard Kuzza land at her side.

"I got stung," the other youma complained, rubbing her thigh.

"And I almost dislocated my shoulder," Dolzene shot right back, scanning the battlefield. "Did you see anything coming our way while you were up there?"

"The big slimy thing near Geldra's cave is dragging itself this way," Kuzza reported.

"You said it was dead!"

"Looked dead to me!"

"We need to- "

A shadow fell over them. Something huge that resembled a cross between a shark and a centipede descended through the insect cloud, pushing apart the wall of bug-zapping spheres. It bucked and jerked, twisting into pretzel-like shapes, yellow ichor seeping from gashes in its carapace.

On the creature's back, anchored between two segments of the elongated body, a tall youma swung her two-handed sword. The blade left a glowing after-image in the air that expanded outwards and cut deeply into the monster's body.

"Hack it to pieces, Umuk!" Kuzza cheered as three leg-shaped fins tumbled to the ground.

The ground shook. It shook way too much for the vibrations to have resulted from the impacts. Eyes widening, Dolzene grabbed Kuzza's arm and pulled. "RUN! It's that fucking worm again!"

Behind them, a set of pincers large enough to pinch someone in half exploded from the cliff face. Rubble and dust parted like water as a skeletal, snake-like form shot from its tunnel and headed straight for the fleeing youma. On the creature's back, a large blister inflated with a hissing noise.

Kuzza lunged, tackling Dolzene to the ground mid-sprint. She didn't let go until the two of them had rolled behind the cover of a crumbled wall.

A wall of flying darts swept past them, rattling their cover with a staccato of impacts and cutting of Dolzene's protest. "Gah. Didn't think it would try that so soon." She listened but could no longer hear the noise of pebbles being ground into dust under the worm's slithering advance.

"It stopped?" Kuzza asked, surprised. On all fours, she moved to peek past the wall. "They are all staring at the sky!"

Still on her back, Dolzene had a good view of the swarm above going still. As if reacting to an unseen signal, it suddenly resumed motion, ascending at a rapid pace.

"What's going on? Can you feel that?" Kuzza asked, her voice low.

Dolzene nodded. There was a heavy, charged quality to the air that grew stronger with every passing second. It felt familiar, like something that she had always perceived on an unconscious level being amplified far beyond normal. Eyes widening, she turned towards the settlement's source of dark magic. "Kuzza, the spring!"

The Great Ruler's power was fountaining from the crevasses, gathering into a bubbling, upwards-flowing stream. It scattered the insect cloud as it passed through, and Dolzene could just make out four figures floating high, high above them. At this distance, she could only distinguish the barest details, but that was enough. The sheer power gathering around the group left no doubt about the identity of its tallest member.

"The Queen!" Kuzza said in an awed whisper. "We are saved!"

Nephrite hovered near Queen Beryl, far more interested in the landscape than in watching his displeased monarch. She really needn't have bothered coming all the way out here only to stare into her crystal ball the whole time. Not that he intended to voice that thought. None of the dark generals were currently in her good graces.

His gaze wandered to the irregular cloud that towered on the horizon like a setting black sun. Hidden underneath, the hijacked portal was spewing out more invaders. From up here, it looked as if trails of ants were marching forth into the countryside. Bored, Nephrite checked if Queen Beryl's expression had changed in the meantime. Nope. Her face remained frozen in a disdainful frown, lips pressed tightly together. What was so interesting about that crystal ball anyway?

He peered at the black orb and saw two youma sprinting. Queen Beryl's fingers moved, and the image changed. It now showed another youma, writhing and screaming soundlessly as the invaders devoured her alive, starting from her extremities.

Nephrite looked away.

"They are so pitifully weak," Zoisite said, pursing his lips. "Those things are doing us a favour, cleaning out the incompetents."

Queen Beryl glanced at him sideways, moving only her eyes. Her look spoke volumes, but Zoisite didn't pick up on that, the fool.

"I am not concerned about the situation," Kunzite said in a firm, almost bored voice. That successfully drew the Queen's attention away from the younger general, but it meant that he was now the target of her piercing stare. "The enemies are no match for all but your weakest youma," he elaborated. "They are large but uncoordinated. Little more than beasts."

"There are a whole lot of them," Nephrite couldn't help point out, "and they are smart enough to head towards more populated areas."

Kunzite turned to face him, his cape fluttering. "Which is exactly how we are going to draw them into a trap and offer their energy to our Great Ruler."

Queen Beryl showed no outward sign that she had heard the white-haired general, causing his superior smirk to fade away a little.

Nephrite, while amused to see his senior general ignored, felt that he needed to contribute to show off his worth. "In the meantime, we can use this external threat to promote greater unity in your Kingdom. In times of war, the dissenters disgruntled by recent security measures will be seen as the traitors they are."

"Vermin," Queen Beryl snarled, voice dripping with disdain. The orb-tipped staff floating before her flared white.

Nephrite flinched away, fearing for his life as he stared into the glare.

Kunzite and Zoisite looked similarly alarmed, backing off as more and more power gathered within the crystal sphere. Tendrils of magic rose like black threads from the surrounding landscape, flowing towards the orb.

Beryl wasn't looking at them, Nephrite realised. Her hair stood upright, dancing like a candle flame around her head, which was facing the battle on the ground.

In the small valley below, the fighting stopped. Nephrite could see dark forms starting to ascend towards him.

Beryl pointed her staff in their direction and launched the ball of darkness that had formed at its tip. The spell moved downwards at a constant rate, white light spilling from cracks in its surface. The sphere grew in size as it fell, which made its descent look slower than it really was.

"I want them dealt with," Beryl stated, her orange eyes narrowed. "Handle it!" Without waiting for an answer, she turned on her heel and faded from sight.

Nephrite stared at the spot she had just vacated. He wished she had been a little more specific about how she wanted them to 'handle' the situation. Or that she had at least thrown her tantrum at the portal instead.

A bright flash from below illuminated the landscape as the explosion swallowed the contested valley.

Up on the stage, Ami sat on a simple throne, her fingers digging into its armrests as she looked at the five large tables in the hall before her. Soon, they would be filled with people, all staring up at her. She touched her collar, willing her thin, semi-transparent cloak to stay closed. Underneath, she was wearing what Jadeite had jokingly referred to as a 'formal bikini', a tiny black thing decorated with gold trim and hexagons that resembled snow flakes.

The dark general himself was wearing shorts that looked like someone had spilled sticky black oil on him, going so far as modelling fake droplets trickling down his legs. His upper body remained bare, showing off his well-defined muscles and -

Ami gulped and managed to tear her gaze away before he could notice her stare. Jered was safer to look at, not that his Ancient Egyptian-looking loincloth hid much more than Jadeite's outfit. She simply wasn't interested in him that way.

On the other side of Ami's throne stood her female moral support. Venna was wrapped in a numerous interconnected leather belts, something that she had picked for herself. It showed even more skin than Ami's outfit, but the dark elf wore it with the same carefree, confident attitude as if she had been covered head to toe in full plate armour.

Somewhat guiltily, Ami hoped the dark elf's smooth white skin and voluptuous curves would draw most attention away from her. For the last member of her entourage, she had played with the thought of just bringing Isolda. However, a dark mistress who was terrified of her would in no way reassure her audience. Instead, she had decided to go with someone else who was guaranteed to draw attention.

Landra, the last youma Jadeite had rescued from Eternal Sleep, was on the very bottom of youma power scale, having nothing but enhanced strength and speed to her name. She was also fairly good-looking by human standards, resembling an elf who was trying to disguise herself as a goblin. Wearing a back-free dress that went to mid thigh, she was the most conservatively dressed female up on the stage. Nevertheless, her green skin, button-like purple eyes, and cyan-coloured hair were exotic features that would distract from Ami.

"I'm calling them in now," she said, having prepared herself mentally as much as she could. Before she could lose her courage, she remotely opened the doors at the other end of the hall.

Civilians waiting in five orderly lines filed into the room. They moved smoothly at first, but steps faltered as the people in the front row saw what was waiting for them inside the room.

Ami saw a well-muscled man's mouth fall open as his eyes widened, and he missed a step before he averted his eyes. A younger man, looking to be in his twenties, turned red like a tomato and stopped until someone bumped into him. To the right, an older woman made a face as if she had just bitten into a lemon and glared at everyone on the stage, while a younger one went pale as a sheet.

Despite the initial hesitation, people quickly found the right colour-coded tables and moved toward them as protocol demanded. Soon enough, a hundred pale and worried face were looking at Ami, displaying various degrees of anger, embarrassment, and disgust.

Ami noted that the civilian's clothes were already suffering from initial stages of corruption, and winced in sympathy. Showing up to the audience wearing tattered, discoloured rags had to make her guests even more apprehensive than they would usually be.

Jadeite raised his hand, and the civilians bowed deeply on his signal.

"At ease," Ami spoke up. Her voice sounded weak to even her, and she resolved to continue louder. "Please, have a seat." She rose and approached the front of the raised stage, her cloak opening slightly from the movement. Even though she knew her top covered everything important, feeling a breeze brush the underside of her breasts through its gauzy parts made her want to flee the stage. It didn't help that a boy about her own age was most definitely not gaping at her face.

Ami made an obelisk-shaped podium rise before her and tried not to give the impression that she was hiding behind it. "First, I gathered you here because I need your skills as craftsmen," she began. A good start, as she saw some of her guests relax marginally. "In an effort to get to the heart of the matter quickly, I won't mince words. The contamination that forced us out of the Avatar Islands is causing another issue."

A faint murmur rose from the crowd as people sucked in breaths and turned even paler.

"It's not dangerous!" Ami hurried to add, raising her hands in a placating gesture. "It's, um offensive and inconvenient, but nobody is in danger. It may look as if things are falling apart," she gestured vaguely in the direction of their clothes, "but they aren't. That's not what's happening. Not exactly. Non-living objects are being remodelled so that they look more pleasing to the dark gods. Meaning obscene and unacceptable."

Ami noticed a renewed interest in the apparel of the people on stage and wondered if her audience hadn't gotten the wrong impression.

"To clarify, our outfits are not the end result of this process. I, um, don't like them much, but they were designed specifically to prevent even worse!" Great, now she sounded as if she was trying to justify herself. Perhaps she should backtrack a little. "What I was about to say is, the changes can be prevented by purposefully designing items along certain aesthetics. Which is where I hope your combined skills will be able to help."

A large man at the closest table raised his hand.

"Yes?"

"Your Imperial Majesty, am I understanding correctly that everyone will have to dress like that?" he asked, pointing at Ami's employees up on the stage.

"W-well yes, I'm afraid so," Ami confirmed, unhappy that she hadn't been able to soften the blow first.

This time, the murmur around the tables was a bit louder, and she saw frowns and downright rebellious faces. A fat man with a large moustache groaned, and one of the women even started crying.

Ami cringed, feeling terrible. "There's still hope you can come up with more acceptable designs that work!" she tried to comfort her listeners. Perhaps she should have started off with her presentation instead? None of this was raising her confidence in her public speaking skills.

"...yes, waterfalls could hide unwanted elements," the voice of the dark empress drifted over from two tables away. "I think it's a good idea. If you could sketch something, then I could test it right away."

Kevan didn't recognise the architect she was talking to, since most of the people in this room were strangers. The one exception was his son and apprentice Kellen, sitting next to him at the table. Most of its other occupants were currently walking around the hall, inspecting a variety of partial rooms that the dark empress had created. It made a honest mason's gall rise to see her build with the wave of a hand what he and his boy would need days to construct. That wasn't the reason he wasn't participating, though. He worked according to other people's plans, he didn't make them.

The dark empress was approaching, but stopped at a closer table and joined a discussion about flowers, and how they were technically plant genitals. Ugh. Leave it to a Keeper to even ruin looking at pure and innocent things. One of her hands moved towards her midriff, but stopped mid-motion and dropped down again. It looked as if she had been about to pull her cloak shut, almost as if she was embarrassed by her attire.

As if people wouldn't be able to see right through the flimsy thing anyway, Kevan thought. Who was she trying to fool? With her reputation, she couldn't be concerned about decency or the dignity of her extorted title. Still, she moved with her shoulders tucked in as if she wanted to cover herself, and her voice lacked confidence. Perhaps she had been saying the truth about not liking this any more than they did?

Kevan looked at his son and found him occupied with sneaking poorly-concealed glances at the empress' backside. He kicked the boy's foot in alarm and whispered "Eyes front!"

Kellen twitched and suddenly seemed to find the surface of the table fascinating.

As the boy's ears turned red, Kevan started sweating. Stupid boy, didn't he consider what could have happened if she had caught him staring? You'd think he didn't have even half a working brain. When Kevan was at that age he would never have - never have passed up an opportunity to ogle a girl dressed like that, he realised with a sinking feeling. Was the demon empress enacting an elaborate plan to corrupt the youth here? He watched her more closely.

"... shift the context in which way?" she asked, smiling faintly at a leatherworker.

The elderly man failed to meet her eyes. "Well, rather than emphasizing the fertility of the wearer, one could show things living off the wearer. Parasite fertility."

Empress Mercury grimaced and turned green, apparently suffering from a vivid imagination. "That, er, yes," she began lamely, "that could work. It would be in line with evil aesthetics, at least. Thank you for the idea. Perhaps you could come up with some preliminary ideas?"

She didn't sound any more enthusiastic about the suggestion than Kevan felt, thankfully. He could live without ever seeing anything prominently featuring tapeworms as part of its design. Shaking his head, he returned to his suspicions. There were many teenagers among the captives, having been too convinced of their own invincibility to do the smart thing and flee when the undead came. Like Kellen. He loved the boy dearly but wished he had gotten away with Sophia. Light, children that age were dumb.

Kevan briefly longed for his absent wife before further dissecting the problem. Boys and girls too hooked on depravity to integrate into decent society would grow up as loyal minions for the dark empress by default. If she wanted citizens that were truly hers, serving even without the threat of blindness hanging over their head, then sullying their morals would be the way to start.

The mason closed his eyes, wishing his conclusions would go away. Short of protecting Kellen, there was not much he could do about them. Except - yes. Despite the danger, he would do his duty as a good patriot, write down his suspicions in his journal, and leave it open where the voice in his head told him to.

Ami closed the door and let herself sink against it while releasing a long, relieved breath. Finally! That was finally over! Her cheeks coloured as she wrapped her cloak tightly around herself. Her strategy of fighting down her embarrassment by likening her situation to participating in a public swimming competition had only been partially successful. The main flaw was that she had never owned any swimsuits this racy. She felt a pang of homesickness, but the prospect of changing into something more modest cheered her right up again.

"Your Majesty!" Torian's voice called from the end of the corridor, stopping her before she could teleport to her chambers.

"Yes?" She spotted her head warlock getting up from a bench and looking in her direction. He took a step towards her, only to jump back with a startled cry. A roaring blast of flame barred his path, casting orange light over the corridor.

The stream of fire cut off, and a rumbling voice declared "We had agreed that I would go first!" From around the bend, the large reptilian head of the speaker appeared, blocking Ami's view of Torian's face.

"Unilateral agreements are invalid! Know your place!" Torian shouted, bringing his jewel-tipped staff down on the dragon's skull. Blue sparks flew from the impact, and the creature's head dipped downwards. "Back, uppity lizard! Back!"

Ami blinked at the sight, wondering if she needed to interfere. She didn't remember hiring a dragon, but its minion bond was in place. Hopefully, her advisers had kept accurate records of everything they had let in while she was distracted.

Torian stepped past his dazed opponent. "Sorry about that, your Majesty," he said, shaking his head. "New recruits. Now, I have-"

That was as far as he got before the dragon growled and swung his snout against the warlock's shoulder.

Tossed aside like a rag doll, Torian stumbled into the wall. Before he could catch his balance, the dragon scrambled fully into the corridor, using the bulk of his scaly body to pin the warlock against the wall.

"No fighting!" Ami ordered, overcoming her surprise.

"I am merely expressing my affection. Like a cat," the dragon stated as it leaned against Torian and brushed past him.

Sharp scales bit into the warlocks robe with ripping noises, and he gasped for breath.

"Stop it! Right now!" Ami shouted, scowling and crossing her arms.

"Oh very well, Keeper," the dragon rumbled, sounding disappointed. "Or do you prefer Empress now?" He backed away from Torian and sat down.

"I do," Ami confirmed. The term had less unfortunate associations than 'Keeper', and she needed any advantage she could get. She spared a worried glance at Torian, who was on all fours and wheezing, but seemed uninjured.

"Then I shall address you as Majesty from now on, Keeper," the dragon drawled.

Satisfied that Torian didn't need medical help, Ami inspected the dragon more closely. She recognised the patterns around his mouth and realised why he seemed so familiar: he was her old sparring partner! While not all of her memories about him were happy ones - being covered in dragon drool came to mind - she was, on the whole, glad to have him back. Spirits lifted enough to ignore the little brawl, she said "Welcome back. You wanted to talk to me?"

"Yes, I need your permission to use your treasury as my lair," he answered, his tail writhing like an excited snake.

Ami considered the request. She didn't really have a problem with a dragon guarding her gold, but... "That was urgent enough to shove my head warlock aside for?" she asked, frowning.

"Naturally. I had to get to you before the other dragons can."

"What other dragons?" Calling upon her dungeon heart, Ami checked if she had somehow managed to miss more than one dragon joining her forces. She had not.

"The news that you moved crates upon crates of gems to your dungeon is spreading like a wildfire through the Underworld. It is only a matter of time until they arrive, looking for a seizable hoard to nest on," the dragon replied.

"I- right," Ami said quietly, still digesting the notion that the rumour mill could be working in her favour for once. Dragons were comparatively unproblematic creatures, in her limited experience, though she might have to expand a few corridors. She nodded and smiled briefly. "Well, I see no immediate reason to deny your request, so you can go ahead."

"Thank you. I will be off furnishing my new home." In a display of agility that had Torian ducking for cover, the dragon wriggled until he had turned around in the empty corridor.

"A disrespectful beast," Torian grumbled as his opponent stomped off. His scowl deepened as he brushed the dust from the tatters of his robe. He mumbled a quick spell that patched the gashes in his robe with stiff, bone-like plates. His expression changed into a servile smile as he faced Ami. "In any case, I have news that may be of interest to you, your Majesty. A lesser Keeper than you might even find them concerning."

"Go on?" Ami encouraged, her arms crossed over her chest. She felt insecure in her thin cloak, and the warlock's words weren't exactly raising her expectaions.

"The subordinates you set to the task of contacting the Avatar," he furrowed his brow for a moment, "were successful. For a certain value of success. Snyder seemed less than pleased when the Avatar covered his crystal ball after the words, I quote," Torian distorted his face into a haughty sneer and continued in a mocking imitation of the Avatar's voice "I have nothing to say to you or your Empress!"

"That is somewhat concerning, yes," Ami agreed, trying not to show her disappointment. Inwardly, she was yelling in frustration. Why did he always have to make things so difficult? So many problems could be solved by just talking about them!

Torian scratched the back of his head. "Well, it is certainly unwise of him to ignore his betters, but I was talking more about the fact that he's here in Nimbadnur."

Ami felt as if she had been punched in the gut. He was here? She hadn't done anything that warranted him coming after her! Yes, she was no longer on the Avatar Islands, but he had to know that wasn't by choice. The Light Gods had even helped her escape! She bit her lip. That actually made the situation worse, since they would know exactly where to find her current dungeon. What happened to keeping to the spirit of the agreement? She wasn't going to hurt anyone! There had to be more worthwhile uses of the Avatar's time than sealing her away!

Ami forced herself to breathe normally. She didn't know for certain that he was going to attack her. His refusal to talk to her didn't bode well, but it wasn't irrefutable proof that he was here for her. She needed to confirm his precise location, the disposition of his forces, and, most importantly, she needed to get answers out of him. If he declined to communicate by crystal ball, then she would have to send messengers instead. Preferably someone whom the dwarfs wouldn't immediately throw into prison for associating with her.

"Torian. Inform the fairies that I want to see them in my study as soon as possible," she said after going over the short list of potential candidates.

"As you wish, my Empress," the warlock replied, inclining his head.

Ami transported him close to the guest housing and considered her immediate next steps. Caution demanded that she assumed the Avatar to be hostile, so she needed to fortify her dungeon further. If its location was no longer secret, then she could sacrifice secrecy for improved defensibility. If not - well, she would have to figure out if that was the case and then evaluate her options.

A warm breeze made her cloak billow, and she looked down at her bare legs. She would ponder that problem while changing into clothes more suited for a diplomatic meeting, she decided.

Last edited: Jul 1, 2016

Frenzied Fortification

Originally on 2013-09-21T02:10:00

Ami sat alone on her side of the long table, pleading her case to the seven fairies sitting across from her. "I'm more than willing to pay the dwarfs for the land I'm using, but I don't have any negotiators I could send aside from you," she said. "The dwarfs won't listen to anyone associated with a Keeper. You are diplomats from a third party, they will have to at least hear you out!"

"Before they lock us up and throw away the key," the redhead sitting furthest from Ami muttered under her breath. She was looking dishevelled and had dark rings under her eyes.

"If I may, your Majesty?" Dandel, the oldest of the fairy sisters, raised her hand. "Ordering an ambassador from an independent nation to act as your messenger is highly irregular," The indigo-haired fairy had yet to touch the steaming cup of tea before her.

"But it's not forbidden either, right?" Ami asked, turning to her. "You wouldn't get into trouble if you did this for me?"

"Technically, if we went travelling while we were supposed to be here, we could be accused of dereliction of duty," Cerasse pointed out, demonstrating that she was paying attention despite being busy arranging cookie crumbs in a neat circle.

"That would mean someone had to replace us, and I can't think of anyone who would want the job," Tilia commented. Arms crossed behind her head, she was leaning back so far with her chair that Ami expected her to tip over any moment now. The fairy's emerald eyes suddenly went wide as her brain caught up with her mouth. "No offence intended, your Imperial Majesty!" she added in a hurry, sitting down straighter.

"We could ask for permission," Roselle suggested.

Ami smiled gratefully at the orange-haired girl. "Could you perhaps do so while on the move?" she asked, worried about additional delays. "The dwarfs are coming here now!" She had been dismayed to see how many soldiers were moving through the gates of the closest towns, both arriving from the nearest villages and departing in the general direction of her dungeon.

"I'm a little sceptical about getting authorization to act on your behalf," Dandel cautioned.

"People could die needlessly, and not just because they are forcing me to defend myself!" Ami said, looking directly into Ambassador Camilla's eyes. "Nomadic orcs live in the mountains. Look!" A map appeared before her and dropped onto the table. It wasn't as good as what she could have produced using her computer, but her employees had done accurate enough work.

The fairies leaned forward, even Anise curious enough to stop attempting to burn holes into Ami with her glower. She had been doing that ever since catching a glimpse of Ami's imitation uniform when her cloak had opened a little.

"We are here," Ami indicated one particular mountain with little regard for secrecy, since the dwarfs already knew where to find her. "Here, here and here," she indicated thick red dots to the west, south-west, and north-east of her dungeon, "are the major towns in the area." Initially, they had looked about three days of travel away from her location, but the dwarfs were crossing the mountainous terrain faster than she had anticipated.

"The map looks really empty," Camilla noted, her gaze darting from one blank area to the next.

"Most of it is mountains and wilderness," Ami explained, "with the dwarfs preferring to settle in the valleys." She gestured at the sparse small dots in the narrow green-coloured zones of the map. Her voice grew more concerned. "Since most soldiers are gathering at the towns for a strike against me, they can't protect all those villages. I don't want them to find their homes pillaged and their loved ones dead when they get back!"

Camilla's fingers whitened as she gripped her teacup tighter, and she looked at her sisters for help.

"Empress, can't you just hire the orcs and keep them under control?" Melissa suggested, tilting her head to the side.

"I already have people trying to track down and contact the different clans," Ami answered, "but they are hard to find. Please, talk to the dwarfs for me! Do you really want to stand by idly when you could prevent much unnecessary misery, Ambassador?"

The blonde swallowed and inclined her head with a sigh. "Fine. We'll do it."

Her sisters didn't look happy, but they did they contradict her.

"Thank you so much!" Ami stood with a brilliant smile. "I don't want to sound pushy, but could you please get ready to depart as soon as possible?" She felt her cheeks flush a little, feeling uncomfortably about being so insistent. Unfortunately, she had a lot of work waiting for her.

"Can we keep the map?" the green-haired fairy asked as she and her sisters got up.

Ami hesitated. "Yes, but it would be easier if you simply flew west until you found the river and then followed it to the town downstream. It's not the closest one, but you also won't lose time getting lost. "

"Hey, we aren't that bad!" Anise snapped.

Ami raised her hands. "I didn't mean to imply that. While using the crystal ball, I noticed that mountains are hard to recognise from above, and I can't imagine it getting any simpler when you are travelling between them. Now excuse me please," she bowed, "but I really have to return to my preparations."

Ami sat in the centre of an ever-expanding pile of discarded papers and sketches, alternating between jotting down notes, staring blankly into space, and shouting short, precise instructions. To her left, a sandwich missing only a single bite hid underneath a few pages of schematics, and a little further away, her lunch had been lost under a paper avalanche. The imps that would normally have cleaned up around her were busy elsewhere in the dungeon.

"Your Majesty," an unkempt man with large earrings said as he approached Ami's raised platform, "three more warlocks have collapsed."

Ami twitched and looked up from her work. Her command centre was arranged like an upside-down, hollow step pyramid, with each floor easily visible from her elevated position. She shook her aching fingers as her gaze swept over the stair-like ranks, quickly locating a row of blank mirrors, with three hunched-over bodies on the chairs before them. Mana exhaustion from having to suddenly power the devices from their own reserves was the most likely cause of their unconsciousness. "I'll fix it in a moment," she said, transporting the unconscious figures to the infirmary. "Torian!" she called, looking down from her perch. "Are the rainfall configurations done yet?"

The warlock working on the lowest and closest floor glanced up from his wet desk, sweating. "Very soon, your Majesty! Very soon!" he assured her with a smile that bared his gleaming white teeth. "In the meantime, I have mitigated some load on the system by having your dragons power your smelters instead!"

Ami's Keeper sight showed her the forges, and she quickly spotted the two dragons breathing fire into the furnaces. Goblins with a small pot full of molten metal crawled over them, coating the dragons' scales with a layer of molten steel.

"I see." Ami approved of the power savings, even if it meant she'd have to take into account the changed loads. "Good initiative, but I really need the adjustments as soon as possible," she told him. "I'd do them myself if I could delegate the dungeon expansion instead."

"Understood, my Empress," Torian confirmed.

Ami wished she still had the near-surface heat sources that made geothermal power so practical on the Avatar islands. Here, she had a few windmills, which were currently hooked up to her gem furnaces. The rest of her electricity came from water-powered turbines. Water that ran down the mountainside courtesy of the corruption she had let loose on the surface when she learned that the dwarfs were coming. Now if only it would stop giving her snow or hail instead of rain occasionally, thereby causing unpredictable fluctuations in her power grid. That would be much easier on the rats claiming surface terrain for her as fast as they could too.

"Empress Mercury, we have to talk!" Cathy called out loudly as she stalked into the room, surrounded by a swarm of excited goblins. The brushes and paint buckets they were holding did not bode well for anyone. When the blonde stopped, they began - or rather continued - doodling on her armour.

"Those, um, drawings..." Ami began, staring at Cathy's armour. With a lot of imagination, she could make out distorted worms, centipedes, and ticks. The parasites were too crudely drawn to look really disturbing, at least.

"Yeah, well, I figure it's better than getting distracted in the middle of the battle by my breastplate suddenly deciding that it should really look as if it was carved from clear ice," the swordswoman explained, shooing a too insistent goblin out of her way. "Also, stop building stuff while I'm talking to you and pay attention, because this is important!"

The red glow in Ami's eyes became more pronounced as she focused fully on Cathy, and the gaggle of goblins around the blonde took a collective step away from her.

"Yes?" Ami asked, a hint of her irritation seeping into her voice to mask her trepidation. Not more problems.

"To summarise, your plans for rapid response squads? They don't work," the blonde said.

"But-"

"Look, I know it should work in theory, but in practice, your troops can't do it. With more time to train and maps that don't become obsolete the moment we get them? Sure. As things are? No. "

"The coordinates-" Ami protested.

"Only tell us where to go, not how to get there." Cathy sighed. "I've run some drills with the best orcs, and even they got lost. You have to add something to the new corridors that will helps us navigate them, or all the fancy mirrors in the world will be of no use," She made a sweeping gesture with her arm that encompassed the scrying devices on the walls."

"Darn it! All right, I'll see what I can do." Ami muttered in frustration.

"That's all I ask," Cathy said cheerfully. "I'll tell my subordinates the good news!" She left, surrounded by her posse of green-skinned artists.

Ami sighed deeply. As if she didn't have enough work already, creating and balancing a power grid with questionable inputs on the fly while expanding her dungeon. While also keeping it from interfering with the system of channels and pipes that collected water and guided it through the mountain for various tasks. Without sufficient time to plan it all out.

Ami rested her head in her palms. No, now she also needed to come up with some sort of colour-coding system to let her troops pick the right direction at intersections, and apply it correctly as she excavated more tunnels. She stared blearily at the screen of her Mercury computer before gritting her teeth and carrying on.

The winding mountain path had a deep ravine on one side and was barely enough for two mule-drawn wagons to pass each other, but large boulders and groups of crooked pine trees shielded most of it from view.

Ami suspected that it was this cover that had prompted a small band of dwarf soldiers to take this route. The moment she appeared before them on the middle of the road, someone yelped "Keeper!" in alarm. The foremost warrior grabbed a horn from his belt and blew into it, producing a deep, echoing sound.

"Excuse me! Can-"

One of the mules shied from the sudden noise and jerked sideways, rattling the cart it was dragging. Its passengers jumped off, metal boots ringing as they struck the ground. Their comrades were already scattering.

"- I talk to- "

A hail of crossbow bolts cut off Ami's attempt at diplomacy, turning the front of her ice golem body into a pincushion.

"-yohhhhk- " She blinked when her tongue refused to move, pinned to the back of her throat to by a bolt that had entered her open mouth. Surprised and annoyed by her sudden inability to talk, she darted into cover behind one of the pines. Back pressed against the tree, her attempts to pry loose the slick projectile became increasingly hectic as she heard someone shout orders and the dwarfs fanned out. Finally, she managed to dislodge the thing by hitting the back of her neck with her fist. "Please, I'm just here to negotiate!" she shouted as more bolts whistled past.

"That so?" A gruff voice came from the direction of the dwarfs. "Then stay where you are and don't move!"

Progress at last! "Very well. I can do that. I'm glad we-"

Something struck the ground close to her hiding spot and exploded. The detonation slammed the broken trunk of the pine into Ami, breaking part of her shell and sweeping her off the mountain path.

As she went tumbling down the ravine, bouncing off the steep incline every few metres, she caught brief glimpses of a line of bearded, cheering faces on the path above. She would have to find another way, it seemed.

"Focus on their leaders if you can," Ami addressed the twelve motionless figures staring at her with blood- red eyes. She struggled to keep her gaze on them, rather than on the melon-sized eyeballs on fleshy stalks that protruded from the floor. Whenever her attention lapsed, she found her gaze drawn toward the undulating devices. "If they are somehow protected, find someone who isn't."

"We shall be relentless," a black-robed man confirmed, elongated fangs glittering in his mouth as he spoke. With his left, he reached over to the eyeball standing closest to him and brushed over its smooth, wet surface with his fingertips.

Ami found the way the device leaned into the caress rather disturbing. She may have derived her communication spell from the things, but that didn't make them any less creepy and gross.

A second vampire took a gliding step forward, this one a female. In as far as the undead had body language, hers seemed uncertain. "Your Majesty, can you offer us advice on the best approach here? Should we be intimidating? Select targets of the opposite gender?"

"We are not trying to seduce anyone into joining us," Ami felt necessary to clarify, given the typical purpose of this kind of dungeon room. "Simply convince someone in charge to talk to me. No threats either. Be polite but insistent."

"As you desire." The vampire acknowledged, bowing. When she rose, she had a malevolent grin on her face. "We shall not give our targets even a moment of reprieve."

While searching for idle employees she could assign to dungeon maintenance, Ami spotted Tiger talking to her mother with a crystal ball. Surprised, she almost forgot to drop her senshi transformation before she transported herself over to her adopted sister. "Hello Mum, Sailor Moon, Tiger!" she greeted everyone with a smile.

"Hi Ami!" Sailor Moon replied, waving cheerfully. She blinked. "Is it really hot at your place?" she added.

Hot? Oh, the clothes. Instead of going into a long-winded, embarrassing explanation, Ami simply went with part of the truth and nodded. "Yes."

Her friend's face brightened. "Then how about you introduce ice cream to that world?"

Mrs Mizuno concentrated more on the important issues. "Ami! Are you all right?" she asked, her concerned face growing larger within the scrying device as she pulled it closer. "You look exhausted."

"I'm under a lot of pressure right now," Ami understated the situation. She glanced over at her grinning sister. "Tiger, why didn't you tell me you are back?"

"Because everyone said you shouldn't be disturbed," the black-striped girl answered. "Besides, I don't think checking the mail for the civilians is a priority for you right now."

"It would still have been nice to know," Ami answered, though she privately agreed.

"Also, I needed an opportunity to tell them about your rapid descent into foulest evil," Tiger said, pointing her thumb at the crystal ball.

Ami's heart skipped a beat. "What? What did you -"

"You sent me out to make arrangements so you can consort with," Tiger looked sideways and brought her face closer to the crystal ball, "lawyers!" Pointing an accusing finger at her nonplussed sister, she continued "And just a bit earlier, you sicked tireless, bloodthirsty telemarketers on people! Evil! Evil I tell you!"

A faint smile played around Mrs. Mizuno's lips, but it disappeared when she saw that Ami had tensed and was only now relaxing.

"That wasn't very nice, Tiger," Sailor Moon chided.

"Come on, it was hilarious! Did you see her face?"

"She looked scared that you had done something hurtful," the pig-tailed blonde contradicted. Her frown implied the unsaid word "Again."

Tiger crossed her arms and turned away. "W-well, it's not my fault she can't take a joke!"

Before the ensuing silence could become awkward, Mrs Mizuno asked "Lawyers, Ami?"

"Um, yes." Ami confirmed. "I thought it would be easier to make diplomatic progress if I knew the local laws and customs and could act within their framework," she explained. "I was trying to hold off on contact with the dwarfs until I completely understood the legal situation, but..." She shrugged her shoulders and hung her head. Some of her frustration must have leaked into her voice, because a worried crease appeared on her mother's brow.

"Ami? What's wrong?" Mrs Mizuno asked in a small voice.

Ami didn't want to burden her mother with the knowledge about the impending attack, but on the other hand, leaving her in the dark would worry her just as much. In the end, she didn't want to hide even more things from her mother. "Oh Mum, they are coming here! They are going to attack me and I can't run and I don't want to hurt them but they think I'm evil and don't talk to me and they won't stop and I don't know what to do and it feels horrible!" She blurted out everything that had been weighing on her mind and then gasped for breath.

"Ami. Ami! Calm down," Mrs Mizuno called out in a comforting voice. "It's all right. We'll find a solution together," she said.

Ami doubted that, but she was grateful for the support. With some effort, she brought her breathing back under control and suppressed the sob that was threatening to spill from her throat.

"Let's approach this methodically. You said they aren't talking to you," Mrs Mizuno continued in the calm, clinical voice she used when diagnosing a patient. "What have you tried already?"

"I sent diplomats from a third party to talk to the dwarfs. I'm trying to get their neighbours, who are willing to negotiate, to initiate contact on my behalf. I tried meeting them in person, but they threw a bomb at me."

Her mother gasped.

"I wasn't in any danger! I was using an artificial body," Ami hurriedly reassured her. "Anyway, I have employees trying to talk to them telepathically right now, and I have also tried dropping a bunch of letters on them, but they are treating them like landmines."

That last attempt had at least slowed down the enemy advance a little, though Mareki disapproved of having to get so close to their crossbows.

"I have nothing to add off the top of my head," Mrs Mizuno said, "That seems fairly thorough."

"I could try talking to them too? With the crystal ball?" Sailor Moon offered.

Ami didn't think they would believe a random stranger more than her, and was about to say so, but reconsidered when she saw Usagi's hopeful expression. "Thank you," she said instead. It wasn't as if Sailor Moon could make them want to talk to her any less.

Mrs Mizuno's lips were a thin line. "In that case, are you adequately prepared to fend them off?"

"I hope so. I'm turning my dungeon into a fortress and am preparing for a siege," Ami replied. "Tunnels and seismographs to spot enemy miners early, guard rooms full of troops on rotating shifts, barricades to seal off compromised sections, and lots of non-lethal traps." A bit more subdued, she added "I'm also building more accelerated farms, but I fear I won't be able to adequately feed everyone for the first three days if I end up with many prisoners."

"What about fresh water?" her mother asked, examining a different, just as vital angle.

"I have a magical storm providing a steady supply," Ami was happy to tell her. With more area under her control, the corruption effects were increasing in magnitude. If she shifted her perspective outside of the dungeon, she could see a massive column-shaped cloud towering in the sky, its tapering bottom pointing directly at her mountain. It was raining so heavily now that she was actually worried about causing inundations further away.

"And troop numbers?" Mrs Mizuno asked.

"Um, from preliminary sightings, I believe that my troops are outnumbered perhaps four to one," Ami admitted.

Mrs Mizuno winced a little before she schooled her features into a cautiously optimistic expression. "Ah, that isn't so bad. If I recall correctly, well-trained and disciplined medieval forces could hold a fortress against such odds for as long as they had supplies."

Ami didn't have the heart to tell her that more than a third of her soldiers were goblins, which were the exact opposite of disciplined and well-trained. "It still doesn't feel right. I mean, those dwarfs are trying to do the right thing. I don't want their blood on my hands!"

Mrs Mizuno remained deep in thought for a moment before she spoke " Ami, the common soldiers. Do they know they don't have to fight you?"

Ami shook her head. "I don't know. I have been trying to talk to their leaders."

"Well, then you will have to let them know. Can you magic up," she waved her hand through the air, "something along the lines of a loudspeaker or megaphone? Let them know that you don't want to harm them and that you are simply defending yourself. Constantly. Make it completely clear that they have nothing to fear from you if they just leave you alone."

Ami nodded. It made sense to her, but she privately worried how her evil underlings would react to that.

"If they still keep coming, then you will have done all you can and won't have to feel guilty for defending yourself! Don't let them hurt you, Ami!" Mrs Mizuno exclaimed, her voice fiercer than Ami had ever heard her before.

"I'll-"

"Tiger, give your sister a hug from me," Mrs. Mizuno ordered, making both the older girl and Ami start.

The two looked at each other, their eyes wide, then looked at the crystal ball.

"Now!"

Sailor Moon was smiling and giving them a thumbs up, and Mrs Mizuno gave no indication that she was joking.

Tiger raised an eyebrow and shrugged, then took a step forward.

Ami went stiff as muscular arms enveloped her. It felt a little awkward at first, but not all that bad. Warm and comforting, even. Ami's fists slowly unclenched, and before she knew it, she was returning the hug, clinging to Tiger as if her life depended on it. A hand was patting her on the head in an unpractised, somewhat embarrassing way, and she felt something wet on her cheeks.

"Do your best, Ami. I believe in you," her mother said.

"You'll find a solution, Ami. You always do!" Sailor Moon added.

Their declaration of confidence didn't change the situation, but in Tiger's arms, Ami smiled and felt more confident than she had for a long time.

Half a day later, Tiger was bored as she chewed on the bland chicken leg she had bought from a market stall. Baron Leopold's city was dreadfully uninteresting. She hadn't gone through great effort to make her human disguise look considerably different from Mercury and only changed her hair black. The mischievous part of her that had pushed her to make an appointment here hoped that some citizens would notice her resemblance to the dark empress and jump to the right conclusions. The resulting shouts, panic, and fleeing townsfolk would have been a welcome distraction from waiting for her contact.

Where was that lousy lawyer anyway? He should have met her near the fountain almost half an hour ago. Tiger scanned the crowd and noticed that people were gravitating towards the main street. Hoofbeats and the noise of clanging metal were approaching from the direction from the castle. A parade? Soldiers riding out for a mission?

Curious, the disguised youma pushed her way through the gaggle of cheering people until she had a front row position. Which, should the group include Baron Leopold, carried a not inconsiderable risk of him recognising her and an exhilarating chase ensuing. So sad. Ami would be quite disappointed if that happened. Well, actually she was busy protecting the furthest out imps from snipers, so she would hardly notice. Or want to talk to a lawyer. Changing circumstances had turned this whole lawyer idea into something of a waste of time, in Tiger's opinion.

She could see the foremost riders now, and yes, one of them had an absolutely massive moustache, fancy armour, and a purple plume on his helmet. That just had to be the famed Baron Leopold. He was talking with... "Huh? What in the Great Ruler's name is he doing here?"

The figure riding on a white horse next to Baron Leopold was unmistakeably the Avatar.

"...failed too. So did the wedding band plan. Lord Shinehame is spanking your subordinates pretty well in the south too, and -"

"Shut it. I don't care about those losers anyway," Mukrezar grumbled, steadying himself on a table as he glared at a crystal ball.

"Far be it from me to suggest that you are stretching your forces too thin, your Ambitiousness, but..."

A growl sound came from the pink-haired elf. "I hate him hate him hate him HATE HIM sooo much! He's cheating!" he shouted, pounding the table with his fist.

"What's wrong, your Hypocrisy?" the imp butler asked as he approached, carrying a tray with a steaming kettle and a cup full off black liquid. "Underhandedness is to be approved of!"

"He stole my trick!" The pink-haired Keeper struck the table again, making the crystal ball on it jump. The composite picture of the Avatar being in various places at once dispersed as Mukrezar whirled around and glared at his minion. He snatched the cup from the tray and drowned it in one go, after which the dark circles around his red-blazing eyes faded a little.

"Aw, it must be so tragic to have another plan backfire on you," the imp replied, dodging the cup tossed at his head by leaning to the side.

"How am I supposed to find where he is making his new mantle when I don't know where he is?" Mukrezar asked rhetorically.

"Basic deduction, your Sleeplessness?" the butler asked as he poured his master another cup.

"Worth another try." Mukrezar snapped his fingers, and a world map carved from stone lowered itself from the ceiling, dangling from rattling chains. "Here we go." He pointed at the Avatar Islands, and its carved landscape crumbled to dust. "Not there, courtesy of yours truly."

His finger moved on to the Shining Concord Empire and hovered there as he thought aloud. "Here? Nah. Can't have the silly fairies get all high on magic and fly into trees or stab themselves on a unicorn or something. Even though a mangled pile of glittery sky vermin would be a public service, really."

"Truly a missed opportunity," his butler chimed in.

"Anyway, not there either." The boomerang-shaped continent crumbled away. "But do take a note that if I ever end up with more magic than I know what to do with, I'll dump the excess over there."

"As if you would ever run out of bad ideas before you run out of power, your Ingeniousness."

"My ideas are perfectly fine."

"Impeccable as your aim, Master," the imp mocked, standing still as the crystal ball missed him by a solid two metres. "Perhaps you may wish to try some actual sleep for a change, your Twitchyness?"

"Be quiet." Mukrezar's finger moved on. "Next! Deserts, no. Ice, no. Ocean, unsuitable too," he continued, " leaving," his eyes narrowed, "pretty much everywhere else. Well, I'm stumped." He threw up his arms, and a bolt of lightning shattered the map. "And too tired for this!"

The butler imp took cover behind his tray as stone shards pelted it and shrugged. "More potion, Master?" he asked, holding the kettle forward with his other hand.

The pink-haired elf ignored him. "Oh well, when in doubt, just kill everyone. If I just eliminate all the fakes, I'll have to find the right one sooner or later!"

"This entire attack is ill advised, Count Ornish", the Avatar said, looking over the troops assembled in the rough cave. A solid wall of rune-covered shields glowed dimly, hiding most of the plate-armoured dwarfs behind them. "Empress Mercury did not come to conquer your lands. There is absolutely no reason to attack her at this time."

A group of engineers assembling a large drill nodded a silent greeting at them as they walked past.

Ornish's jaw made chewing motions as he frowned. "Lord Avatar, you are a peerless warrior, and I greatly value your assistance, even in limited form." He glanced briefly at the man's left ring finger, covered by an armoured gauntlet. "Nevertheless - and with no disrespect intended - neither you or the Light have a convincing track record when it comes to conducting campaigns." He was speaking hesitantly, as if every word was costing him greatly, and his eyes were on the ground before him.

The sound of gritting teeth came from the Avatar.

"Your advice goes against traditional doctrine that demands Keepers to be engaged and destroyed without delay," Ornish continued. "Our nation remains deeply scarred from the one time we ignored it. We attack in the morning."

Last edited: Jul 1, 2016

The Enemy Approaches

Originally on 2014-05-16T17:04:00

The inside of Ami's command centre was a strange blend of modern war room and dungeon architecture. Wide stairs led up from the bottom of the square chamber in all cardinal directions, providing access to the four successively receding floors. On each of these terraces, screen-like mirrors in ornate metal frames lined the walls and showed images of the outside. Between them, water trickled down over the murals, veiling the more objectionable motives and cooling the hot air.

On the top floor, some goblins were playing with the cascading water instead of occupying their cushioned armchairs made of rock. Undeterred, the mirrors they should have been watching kept showing needles that traced lines onto scrolling paper.

Fortunately for Ami, the warlocks seated on the two floors below were more disciplined and kept scanning the surface for her enemies. Only one of them was not paying attention and feeding a potted carnivorous plant instead, but in his defence, there was nothing to see on his dark screen anyway.

One floor deeper still, none dared shirk their duties. Not only did the command staff reside on this level, but the dark empress herself was in attendance just below, at the bottom of the chamber. Her command chair, currently empty, stood at the centre of the lowest floor, surrounded by seats for her personal assistants. Various map tables were scattered around the place, leaving enough space for groups of imps to dart between them.

One of these tables showed the mountain and its neighbours in accurately-modelled detail. An imp stood astride two peaks, updating the flooding status of the valley below with the aid of a ladle and a bucket of water.

Ami shooed the creature away with an impatient twitch of her hand because she needed an unobstructed view. She leaned on the edge of the round table, frowning at the many crevices, forests, and rocky protrusions that could be hiding her enemies.

Footsteps approached her from behind, and she turned to see Jered come down the stairs. "Here, the latest requests for flares," he said, holding out a sheet of paper covered in coordinates.

Ami took the note and covered a yawn with her free hand, no longer even batting an eye at seeing him walk around shirtless. She glanced at the map for reference, reached through space, and projected a number of overcharged light spells outside her territory. Several scrying mirrors two floors above brightened, showing raindrops turning into glistening threads as they fell towards the dimly-lit circles of forest canopy below.

"Tired?" Jered asked as Ami rubbed her eyes. "Personally, I think you would have been better off sleeping than hunting dwarfs all night. Even with your lights, the scrying spells don't show much in the dark."

"Which is exactly why I need to be here," Ami contradicted. "I can patrol with my Keeper sight, which isn't impeded by the darkness."

Jered shrugged. "On your territory, anyway." He approached the map, eyeing the parts shaded in aquamarine critically. "Which would limit you mainly to this mountain and to those thin paths leading outwards. Still?" He raised an eyebrow at Ami.

"The rats aren't claiming as fast as expected," she allowed.

"Ah, yes. Rain, backpacks and silly dances on steep inclines don't make for a safe working environment."

"Actually, that's not the main issue. They simply don't know instinctively where I need them to go, like the imps do. In narrow tunnels, that's not much of a problem, but in the open terrain..."

"I don't event want to think about having to order them all around individually," Jered said, shaking his head. "So, I take it the dwarfs are staying away from your sensory trails?" He traced one of the straight aquamarine paths with his finger as it followed the terrain contours up a nearby mountain.

Ami nodded, her shoulders drooping. "At least I know where they aren't." She stared at the regions not in her colour, worrying about how much area that included. "Every little thing helps." In a whisper, she added "I don't want this fight."

Above, metal armour rang against stone as Cathy leaned over the railing. "I bet you stopped them from approaching anyway. All those flares must have messed up their night vision," she said cheerfully, a tone that didn't properly match the dark circles around her eyes.

"I'll take that bet," one of the warlocks said, turning away from his mirror to face her. "Because, technically speaking, dwarfs can't see in the dark. They can, however, sense the concentration of minerals in their vicinity, which, in close proximity, makes for a suitable substitute and-"

"Unless you can do the same with your scrying, I'm not interested," the blonde cut him off. "Sun's about to rise anyway, so search harder!"

Ami jerked in surprise when she felt something unexpected from her territory.

"Here!" A goblin on the top floor shouted, climbing up on her chair and jumping up and down while she pointed at the mirror behind her. "Flat line thingy going all spiky!"

Ami raised her head, taking only an instant to verify that the position of the supervised seismograph coincided roughly with the odd disturbance she had felt - past the first ring of defensive corridors already! Barely a moment later, an image of the place in question formed in her mind. Flat and rocky, it lacked vegetation that could have hidden invaders. There weren't any suspicious footprints in the mud either, and the raindrops splashing into the omnipresent puddles didn't hit anything invisible on the way down. Certain that she had sensed something Ami remotely filled the area with a Shabon Spray fog before she turned her attention to the underground.

Her Keeper sight - maybe she should call it Keeper sense instead - didn't let her see through the layers of earth and stone, but she could still use it to listen, even some distance away from any claimed surface. In a way, it was similar to a seismograph, with her dungeon heart interpreting small noises and vibrations for her in order to show her the general layout of her subterranean surroundings.

"-troops to those coordinates!" Cathy ordered, her metal boots having left a little dent in the floor when she had jumped down from above. She was standing at a different table, moving tiny figures of orcs and goblins across a map of the dungeon. A pointy-bearded warlock stood across from her, sparks of mana twinkling in his right eye as he mentally relayed her orders.

"Wait, there's nothing!" Ami interrupted, her attention fully returned to the command centre.

Cathy threw her a surprised look and quickly told the warlock "Call them back, false alarm!"

The magic user nodded mutely, grabbed the representations of the soldiers and moved them back to the nearest guard post.

Ami felt the same sensation as before, this time from the opposite side of the mountain. She didn't even wait for one of the goblins to announce the disturbance and immediately observed the area in her mind. Movement, just above the tree line. She suppressed the momentary fright at having several layers of her defences bypassed and took a closer look at the descending rocks and gravel. A little cloud of dust, present despite the rain and mud, made it clear to her what had happened here.

"Bombardment," she stated for the benefit of those in the command centre even as she felt two additional impacts. Not that anyone could hear her with the way four goblins were shouting at the top of their lungs.

"Here too!" a corpulent green-skinned girl screeched. "Look!"

"No, look mine! Jaggier!"

"Mine more better still!"

Ami sighed. Manning the internal surveillance stations with goblins had sounded like a good idea at the time. With an external mana supply and no need to adjust anything, the job wasn't complicated enough to warrant wasting the time of her more skilled employees on. Attention-seeking goblins could be handled with a little forethought.

Something whistled and cracked in the air. "Shut up, all of you! Quiet!" A woman in a black leather outfit that had nothing to fear from the corruption stalked towards the unruly greenskins, stretching a whip between her hands.

"Eep!" The closest goblin dived behind his chair and hid, and the rest paled and ducked too.

Keeping the goblins in line was about the limit of what Ami was willing to use her few dark mistresses for. They weren't allowed to touch the small underlings, but the goblins didn't know that. "Bombardment," she repeated now that the room was quiet. "They are throwing rocks at us."

"So they are messing up the surface. How scary," Cathy deadpanned. "What do they intend to achieve? Well, aside from getting the goblins all worked up, that is."

Ami wasn't taking the situation quite as lightly. "Blinding us to their approach. The constant impacts are actually very distracting," she stated with a sour expression. "Imagine someone is prodding you with a finger in random places, except in your mind." She looked up at the higher floors and raised her voice. "Goblins! Change of plans! Stop reporting single spikes. Only look for constant activity!"

"Only shout if the there are no holes between the spikes for a while," Cathy translated, being more familiar with the goblins' large selection of uncomprehending expressions than Ami.

"Yes. That," the young Keeper confirmed. Digging dwarfs should produce a different pattern than the boulders raining down on the territory now. Her seismographs could still provide her with a warning, even if it would come much later than she would have liked. She wondered briefly if the dwarfs knew about her detectors. No, probably not. The steady drumming of the falling boulders would also hide any digging noises from more mundane listening attempts. Additionally, the insistent reminders that her land was under attack were getting really, really annoying. Was that why Keepers usually waited with claiming the surface until they had done away with the resistance?

"Where are they launching all those things from?" Cathy mused aloud, peering at the map. "I find it hard to believe that we missed every single catapult being built, even if it was under the cover of a starless night."

"I'm working on that," Ami snapped while entering the impact locations into her Mercury computer, trying to keep up with what her Keeper senses were telling her. She reminded herself that the bombardment, while irritating, didn't pose a direct danger, and let out a long breath. "Sorry. The impacts are making it hard to concentrate," she apologised for her outburst. Still, the sooner she found the source, the better.

Jered was unashamedly looking over her shoulder, blinking at the screen. "Is it just me, or are the rocks landing closer to inhabited areas?"

Ami stopped typing. "Now that you mention it, it does look as if the shots are getting more accurate, but-" she paused as she felt something that chilled her to the core. "What was that?" It had felt like one of the other contacts, with the all-important difference that it came from one of her tunnels underground.

Not losing a second, she investigated with Keeper sight. Sure enough, she found rainwater trickling down into a smooth-walled pit. It gathered on top of the reinforced ceiling of one of the defensive corridors ringing the mountain, and a faint plume of smoke rose from the hole. There were still no dwarfs around. Her eyes widened. "Darn it!"

"Mercury, what's going on?" Cathy asked.

"It's not just a distraction, they can put burrowing enchantments on their rocks!" In her mind's eye, Ami discovered more pits leading deep down now that she knew to look for them. Since they hadn't hit anything directly, they had not felt any different from the regular impacts.

"Shit! If they can just charge and dive into the holes, they'll bypass many of the traps!" Cathy hurried over to Ami's map table. Her eyes darted across the various terrain features, lingering on the closest woods. "Where are the most holes?"

"I'm moving some reaperbots to the critical areas," Ami answered. "There and there. Over here too."

An imp rushed over to the dungeon map and removed a number of scythe-wielding figurines.

Even as she positioned the automatons on the surface, Ami realised that they wouldn't be enough to properly defend the entire threatened area. Not if she didn't know where the attack would be coming from. "I'm using up the water reservoir in sector F9," she informed the others.

Her tremor spell split a cliff, and water gushed forth as if a dam had broken. As it cascaded down the mountainside, it swept along rocks and mud, gathering more and more mass on the way down.

Satisfied, Ami watched the holes in the stream's path fill with liquid and gravel. If the dwarfs wanted to invade from that direction, they would need diving equipment. Still, this was a temporary measure at best, and she needed to find the source of the rocks and shut it down. It was too bad her visor couldn't enhance her Keeper sight. "I'll be back shortly," she announced before she disappeared in a flash of blue.

After the sweltering heat within her dungeon, the air above the snow-topped peak of her mountain felt as if she had jumped into a tub filled with ice water. Frigid raindrops smashed against her visor, drenching her in moments. The parts of her cloak that weren't plastered to her body fluttered in the howling winds, threatening to carry her off like a kite with its rope cut.

Ami remedied the problem by casting a shield around herself, creating a bubble of force that held off the elements. To the east, she could see the sun starting to rise, its disc tinted a mild shade of pink by the layer of magic. In the morning sunlight, the trickles and rivulets running down the west side of her mountain shone red like lava - an impression that wasn't helped by the stack of black thunderclouds that piled up above the peak.

The clouds around the neighbouring mountain peaks all hung much lower, but Ami didn't question her luck. If the weather above her dungeon wanted to defy the rules of physics to allow her a clear view of the valley below, then she wasn't complaining. With fingers stiff from the cold, she instructed her computer to track the trajectories of any flying object below. Shivering, she dismissed the wet cloak that felt as if she was wearing an ice block. Her short shorts and equally short blouse were not meant for this climate either, and with clattering teeth, she muttered a formula that conjured a dry version of her lost garment. Since she had started using that spell, cloaks had quickly become fashionable among the more powerful corruption-plagued magic users inhabiting her dungeon.

Her visor kept recording data, and more and more lines gathered on her screen. One set originated from a copse of trees, another from underneath an overhanging cliff. Too far away to see the equipment from her current location, Ami simply unloaded a Shabon Spray onto both of those locations. She would deal more permanently with them after a little scrying back in her comfortably warm dungeon. As soon as she had located the rest of the launch locations.

Consulting her screen in more detail, she blinked in surprise. There were boulders incoming from what looked like empty ground, rocks, and cliffs. How could anyone position siege equipment on a near-vertical wall, let alone without her being able to see it? No, wait. With projectiles that could smoothly penetrate a considerable distance of rock, there was nothing stopping the dwarfs from firing them from underground.

"I've found them!" Ami announced upon teleporting back to the command centre. "Second floor warlocks! I'm going to mark twenty-six locations on the map. I want each of you to scry on one of them." She raised a finger, pointing at the wrinkly magic user seated closest to her. "You will take the first location." Her finger moved to the right, wandering across the seated magicians in sequence "You take the next, you the next, and so on."

"Yes, Empress!"a chorus of voices replied.

Once she was done placing the markers, she hurried over to her command chair and sat down in front of her own crystal ball. A brief, enthusiastic squeal was her only warning before an imp jumped onto her armrest and attacked her hair with a towel, sending droplets everywhere.

Blinking, Ami decided to endure the treatment - she had been getting fed up with rainwater trickling into her eyes anyway - and concentrated on the locations she hadn't put on the map. Her crystal ball activated, showing her the copse of trees. In the twilight, it was hard to make out the catapult between the tree trunks, but its rectangular contours gave it away. She also spotted five dwarfs servicing the siege equipment, their armour covered in mud and leaves to mute its shine.

For a short while, she observed, wanting to learn more about her opponents. A little off from the centre of the clearing, she spotted two more dwarfs kneeling in front of a boulder. The tools in their hands moved deftly, carving additional runes into a surface already covered in tiny symbols. Ami couldn't tell what they were supposed to do, but circumstances suggested that the patterns were responsible for the projectile's terrain-penetrating properties. Her warlocks should take a look at that, later.

As the dwarfs loaded another rock into the catapult, Ami struck. A single bolt of lightning, strong enough to shatter the construction. Or at least, that was what she expected to happen. Instead, the spell veered off-target as it formed, sucked into a chain made of thick metal links. One of them snapped, crumbling away into thin grey ash. Her target was warded.

The dwarfs stopped what they were doing, their heads whipping into the direction of the magical light show. One of them shouted something, and they all dropped what they were doing.

Ami let them scatter and disappear into the forest because she wanted them to know that fleeing was an entirely viable option. Briefly, she considered testing the properties of the ward. While knowing the capabilities of her opponents would be useful, stopping the bombardment was more urgent. One compressed Shabon Spray later, she had a large, floating Keeper hand with which she gave the closest tree a good shove. The pine's roots tore from the wet ground as it toppled right onto the catapult, smashing it into kindling. One down. With the animated hand, she sifted through the debris and pulled out the chain. An instant later, it landed in one of her laboratories. The boulder the dwarfs had been working on suffered the same fate.

Ami addressed the small group of cloak or robe-wearing figures seated near her chair. "I have dropped some recovered equipment in library appendix three," she told them. "I need its wards analysed as soon as possible."

"Immediately, your Majesty!" The five eager-looking warlocks hurried away at once.

"Loot! Loot! Loot!" one of the goblins above shouted, a chant that was picked up by a second and then cut short by the crack of a whip.

Ami turned her crystal ball's attention to the emplacement underneath the overhanging cliff. Expecting more wards, she didn't waste time with spells. Her ice hand dropped into the hideout before the dwarfs down there knew what was going on. One moment, they were carefully aiming their cannon, the next, the thick tube was ascending toward the sky in the grip of a giant frozen hand. A quick toss later, and a muddy column of water rose from the flooded valley below. Two down.

Ami teleported to one of the mirrors prepared by her warlocks, who flinched at her sudden appearance.

"There's a cave down there, but it's unlit and I can't really see inside, my Empress," he muttered apologetically.

"It's not your fault they don't need light," Ami reassured him absently. She gazed at the image underneath the glass, inspecting the clustered holes in the rock. A light spell should - no, it didn't form. There had to be more wards down there. Overloading them with powerful spells thrown in blindly wasn't an option - she wanted to stop the dwarfs, not kill them. Was there anything nearby she could set on fire and throw into the cave? The rain would be working against her in this case, but -

One of the goblins interrupted her train of thought. "Me think this is steady pointy line?"

"Yes." Ami answered in a flat tone of voice, her heart rate increasing. "Yes, it is." She didn't even have to look at the seismograph for confirmation. The sensation of someone trying to dig into her dungeon left no room for doubt.

"Got proper line too!" a different goblin yelled.

"Me too!"

"They like mine here?"

"Right signal look like this?"

"Enemies emerging from the woods, Q23!" One of the warlocks yelled.

"Same, S21!"

The noise in the command centre surged as different observers began calling out coordinates in quick succession, too fast for Ami to follow them all.

The invasion had begun, faster and more coordinated than she had expected. "You all know what to do!" she shouted over the noise. "Direct your assigned squads to the breaches! Only signal me personally when our soldiers have trouble!"

In the scrying mirrors showing the interior of her dungeon, orcs and goblins rushed through the tunnels, weapons in hand.

"Cathy, concentrate mainly on keeping away the dwarfs on the surface," Ami instructed as she stared at the markers her imps were constantly updating the map with. A forest of red pins surrounded her mountain on all sides, creeping closer as she watched. Reluctantly, she selected warriors from her reserves and reinforced the most likely routes her attackers would take. Under her cloak, hidden from her underlings, she wrung her hands as her dread rose. She had been in worse situations before, but this time, she was fighting innocent people who meant well.

Underground Chaos

Originally on 2014-05-16T17:06:00

When the first wall crumbled, Ami hurried to view its location. She arrived just in time to see bricks and mortar spray into the corridor, propelled by a dwarven shield ramming its way through the weakened masonry.

A short, broad-shouldered warrior forced his way through the gap, pebbles pinging off his armour as he brushed aside the last stones in his way. He exited the dusty opening, narrowed eyes visible through the slit in his full helmet, and looked around. "Way's clear," he called out after a moment and pointed his pickaxe down the corridor. "Smash anything that looks important and mind the trapdoors!"

More stout figures poured out of the hole, jogging after the miner as he took off down the corridor.

"I am not here to attack your country. Leave my dungeon and I won't harm you!" Ami projected mentally at the dozen or so invaders. At the same time, she felt three other walls give way elsewhere in the dungeon, prompting her to deal with this situation quickly.

The dwarfs didn't stop or even hesitate. Their faces were hidden underneath their helmets, but Ami did not spot any change in their body language either. One of them was wearing one of the warding chains she had encountered before as a belt, so chances were they hadn't heard her at all.

The dungeon heart informed Ami of yet another breach on the other side of the mountain. Feeling rushed, she transported her Keeper hand behind the quickly-advancing group and launched the animated mass of water forward.

One of the dwarfs swept his pickaxe through a violet light crystal in passing, turning his torso to the left has he did, and spotted the movement. "Behind us!"

The giant hand smashed into the hindmost dwarf, slamming her into the soldier before her and sending both of them tumble. By now, the others were turning their heads and stopping, or at least trying to. They had been moving fairly quickly, and all the momentum stored in their heavy armour didn't just disappear.

"Stop! Stop! Trapdoor ahead!" the dwarf in front shouted as he was pushed forward, his metal soles screeching as they skidded over the floor.

"Trying!"

Ami winced inwardly as armour rang and the dwarfs in the middle were caught between her shove and the slowing front of the group. Still, she kept shoving, pushing the invaders over like falling dominoes and forcing them forward.

One of them threw himself to the ground and anchored his pick in the stone. With a grunt, he managed to maintain his hold even when the dwarf behind him stumbled over him. The next one didn't manage to keep his balance and landed hard on the prone dwarf's shoulder. There was an ugly snapping noise, and he let go of the weapon's haft, "My arm!"

Ami felt bad for him as she kept pushing the pile of warriors forward, but the many alerts coming from the perimeter of her dungeon meant she couldn't afford the time to be gentle. With a final shove, she forced the soldiers into the trap they had been intending to avoid.

The foremost dwarf waved his arms and jumped ahead with desperate strength, but not far enough. The floor underneath him clicked and dropped away. With a loud splash, he landed in the muddy water below. More splashes and cries of protest followed in rapid succession.

The water wasn't deep enough for Ami to worry about her enemies drowning, but it would certainly keep them from fighting back effectively. Her closest troops should arrive within a minute to fish them out. One group of invaders more or less disabled, without too many injuries. That left only - her eyes widened - about two dozen others, with more popping up all the time. Her stomach plummeted. If all of the enemy parties were about as small as this one, she could be dealing with hundreds of incursions shortly. "Darn it!"

She clenched her teeth, as she opened her eyes and surveyed the screens in her command centre. No choice but to rely on her troops and limit herself to intervening where it made the most strategic sense. Still, knowing that people would get injured and possibly die because she was busy elsewhere... Ami wrapped her arms around herself and pushed those thoughts aside. Both her troops and the misguided dwarfs couldn't afford her to be anything but fully concentrated and efficient right now.

"Faster!" Minkoth urged, his voice echoing through the freshly-hewed tunnel. On his palm, the end of a very short chain glowed red as another link burned to ash. "Dig faster, Urist! He's almost through the wards!"

"Doing the best I can!" the miner in front growled, breathing heavily as he swung his pickaxe through the air.

The tool slowed with a jerk, making a grinding noise as it burrowed into an invisible obstacle. Faintly-glowing cracks spread outward through the space around the enchanted weapon, accompanied by the noise of crumbling rock.

"Coward! Stop casting spells at us when we can't fight back you evil fucker!" the first dwarf shouted, shaking his fist at the chuckling warlock towering behind the barrier of invisible rock.

"B-be polite, that has to be the Emp- Keeper herself," a third dwarf whispered from behind him, a worried frown marring the face behind the open visor. "Anyone else wouldn't have the power to burn through the protections that quickly!"

The warlock chuckled and stood straighter, the hem of his too-long robes hovering a finger's width above the ground. "Pathetic dirt-digging midgets, you are sadly mistaken. I am merely - in as far as such a word can apply to me - Torian, chief warlock of her Imperial Majesty! Who, in her inscrutable wisdom, has decreed that I need to inform you that she bears you no ill will and is going to let you retreat should you chose to leave now."

A dwarf near the front of the squad looked back over her shoulder. "Means she isn't ready to face us yet!" she interpreted cheerfully for the others, and Minkoth felt his mood lift a little. Even if his group should be defeated, others would keep his home safe.

Torian's bored expression turned into a smirk. "Unconvinced by her generous offer? That suits me well. I would not get to play with live targets if you had fled before my might."

"The guy in a dress sure likes to hear himself talk," Urist muttered as he brought down his pick again, shattering more of the invisible rock between them and their attacker.

"At least he isn't casting while he's running his mouth off." another dwarf said, shrugging his shoulders.

"Torian? I think I've heard that name before," someone else pondered.

"Ah, my fame precedes me!" the warlock said with a grin. "Let me add to it. BEHOLD! The instrument of your doom!" He raised his staff over his head, holding it horizontal so that the dwarfs could see its full length. The ivory-coloured implement consisted of a main shaft studded with winding protrusions. "This is the combination of my genius and secrets stolen from the dark gods themselves, carved from the tooth of the eldest dragon!"

Urist gasped and froze and gaped at the magical weapon with dismay that mirrored Minkoth's own. "You defiled such precious material with your shoddy craftsmanship?"

Torian narrowed his eyes at him. "Shoddy, is it now? Well, perhaps you-"

The loud twang of a crossbow being fired interrupted him. Not unlike the dwarven picks, the bolt burrowed straight through the intervening rock as it headed for the warlock.

Torian flinched and went cross-eyed as the pointy blur shot straight at his face, leaving a thin trail filled with sublimating rock powder in its wake. There was a bright flash from the gems set into the projectile as it encountered the invisible dungeon wall and kept going. A smacking impact later, Torian squealed and toppled over backwards.

Minkoth high-fived the dwarf who got up from behind a boulder, crossbow in hand and a grin on her face. "Good one, Olon! Didn't think we'd have to use one of the special bolts this early!"

"Oh, you'll wish you hadn't done that," Torian growled as he sat up, blood trickling down his forehead from a long scratch. The bolt studded with burnt-out gems lay in front of him, bent.

"He's that thick-headed?" Urist boggled.

"Wards of his own," Minkoth muttered, noting the purple smoke originating from somewhere underneath the evil wizard's robe and escaping from the collar.

"Enough talking! Words are clearly wasted on you hairy garbage," Torian said. Black sparks gathered around his staff as he levitated himself back into a standing position.

The warlock started mumbling, his weapon pointed at the dwarfs, and Minkoth could only watch in horror as the last link of the warding chain exploded into powder. This was not supposed to happen! His liege had ordered him to get into the dungeon, and now he was being foiled by a single lousy warlock? The bitter shame and dishonour of failing to heed his baron's command made his arm sluggish as he raised it to signal a retreat. "Back! Fall baph-" He tasted hair that tried to get into his mouth, muffling his words. His skin was prickling everywhere and he could feel the braids of his beard writhe like snakes. What had that black-hearted bastard of a warlock cursed him with?

Ahead of him, the strap of Urist's helmet creaked and snapped. The helmet shot off the other dwarf's head like a cork popping from a bottle, riding on the swelling mass of hair that had been trapped underneath it. Within moments, beard and mane reached the ground, getting tangled in each other as they grew. The miner stepped on it and promptly fell over.

"With how proud you dwarfs are of your beards, you should be thanking me for this!" Torian taunted. "And her Imperial Majesty too, since it was she who gave me this idea!"

Minkoth's own helmet departed, spilling strands of hair over his face and robbing him of his sight. He raised his hand got it about half-way to its destination before it stopped, the joints of his armour clogged with bushels of - oh Forge God no, the spell wasn't limited to just his head!

As he and his warriors struggling against the suffocating masses of fur, he could hear the warlock's high-pitched, mocking laughter.

The floor shook with each step the dragon took towards the group of dwarven invaders, his fiery breath splashing off their hastily-raised shield wall. Panting orcs were taking cover behind the slowly-advancing behemoth, flinching every time a crossbow bolt pinged off his metal-painted scales.

Ami couldn't help but admire the bravery of the four dwarfs still blocking the passage. Sweating from the heat and with their shield arms shaking, they braved the flames to buy time for their companions to retreat. A cold lump formed in her stomach as she noted a dwarf kneeling over a still figure, shake his head and move on.

Carrying their wounded on their shoulders, the dwarfs fled back into the relative safety of the hole they had come from. Their tunnels were too small for the dragon to follow them, and neither orcs nor trolls wanted to fight in a space where they'd have to crouch.

Goblins had no such problems, but Ami no longer sent them in there.

Unbidden, her mind strayed to a tunnel where green-skinned bodies lay in pools of their own blood among crossbow bolts and severed limbs. Their sightless eyes looked up at the low ceiling, staring at her accusingly. If only she had acted faster and prioritised differently when she noticed them coming under attack, she might have been able to do something.

Instead, she had chosen to finish redeploying one of the dragons to a more advantageous location, trusting the six goblin warriors to hold their own against the advancing forced for just a few moments longer. Strategically, it had been the right decision. The sudden arrival of the armoured, fire-breathing monster had stopped the advance of two dwarf squads cold, saving a group of her more valuable underlings.

Ami clenched her fists. She hated having to rank her employees in terms of how expendable they were. Unfortunately, with many different fights going on concurrently, she didn't have any choice in the matter. The dungeon heart granted her many powerful abilities, but being able to pay attention to more than one place at the time was not among them.

Thus, since she was already intervening here, she had to make sure this particular group of invaders wasn't going to regroup and come back. Aiming sufficiently far ahead of their wards, she cast two spells.

The foremost dwarf bit back a curse as pillars of glittering ice rose in his path. Not faltering in his stride, he flipped his pickaxe around and swung at the obstacle with the pick-shaped side. He cursed in surprise when the ice reached out with a slender arm and caught his weapon in a vice-like grip. The wooden haft splintered around the ice golem's fist as she closed it completely, snipping off the head of the pickaxe.

Ami still couldn't completely exclude the possibility that the animated statues might be sapient or had the potential to become so. However, in the current situation, not using them meant she would have to risk soldiers who were undoubtedly people instead. More pragmatically, the golems were shorter than her other troops and less hindered by their size in the dwarven tunnels. Too bad that each of them tied up a portion of her magical power for as long as they lived.

"Your Majesty, enemy charging at surface coordinates B ten!" the shout of a warlock called her back to her physical location. "Big group, no troops close enough to intercept in time!"

Blinking, Ami changed her perspective to the indicated grid square. TWhat did they want at that impassible-looking slope?

Maybe a hundred or so squat invaders darted out of the wet undergrowth, their long, braided beards swaying. Nimble like mountain goats, the lightly-armoured figures hurried across the uneven terrain, hopping over boulders and balancing along narrow ledges.

The black-bearded dwarf at the front stopped to fasten a rope and dangle it down a wall he had just scaled. Ami noticed that he, like a few others, was wearing one of those annoying ward chains around his waist. If she really wanted to, she could break through the protections without straining herself - at the cost of wasting time since the chains failed only one link at a time. It was much quicker to simply work around this obstacle. With a hurried salvo of Shabon Spray Freezing spells targeted at the wet rock ahead of the dwarfs, she coated their route in a layer of ice.

The effects were immediate. Hands slipped as they reached for the rocks ahead, feet stepped on slippery footing, and dwarfs tumbled back down into their companions. The smooth advance slowed to a crawl as the frozen area forced the dwarfs to deploy climbing aids in order to move on.

It would be enough to delay the attack until some troops could reach the threatened area. Ami hurriedly started searching for some soldiers that weren't already fighting or hurrying toward a fight. Were dark elves agile enough to fight in that kind of terrain? Wait, she could make use of the giant vermin that tended to wander in through the portal. She reached into the dark corners of her dungeon and plucked several chitinous, many-legged creatures from their lairs. After dropped the squirming, wriggling bugs near the surface, she shooed them out of the holes the dwarfs were trying to reach. A few more prods of her Keeper hand, and she had them moving in the right direction. Showing complete disregard for trivial things such as vertical cliff faces, the giant insects crawled downwards toward the invaders.

Ami knew the creepy things were a pushover in a fair fight, but even the most enthusiastic mountain climber would think twice about putting his hands where a dog-sized cockroach might eat them. They should keep the situation more or less under control until she could free up stronger defenders. Such as the golems she had previously created. Were they done yet?

One of the statues had grabbed two different dwarfs and hung suspended between them as they tried to pull away in opposite directions. Surrounded by their allies, she twisted and turned to alleviate the impacts of the blows they were raining down on her. Her shell was covered in gashes and cracks from the axe strikes, but only a few hit solidly enough to pierce the ice. By now, the armour she had started out with littered the ground in small frozen pieces, and she was noticeably smaller that before.

The other statue, slick from the water that trickled from her cracks, glided out of the bear hug from a dwarf trying to restrain her. She hit her head on the ceiling and botched her landing, frozen limbs slipping in the puddle of water on the ground. Both she and her her attacker fell over and continued struggling on the ground.

Ami evaluated the situation in a split-second. Had the golems gotten rid of the wards? There was a broken chain gleaming on the ground some distance away, next to a doubled-over dwarf holding his midriff. Another soldier, busy kicking the prone golem repeatedly with his iron-heeled boots, held a second ward with only three or so non-mangled links. Close enough.

Zap. Zap. Zap. Ami used Keeper lightning as fast as she could, but it only worked on her fourth try. The tunnel lit up with blinding light, and a blue-white bolt of electricity hit the water that had leaked from her golems.

The dwarfs standing in the puddle screamed and convulsed. Ami had kept the power down to about that of a taser, but she still swallowed when she saw the twitching bodies. Unaffected by the current, one golem ran off to call the troops outside the tunnel, while the other started disarming the fallen enemies.

Confident that these particular dwarfs would soon sit out the battle within her prisons, Ami concentrated on the notifications from her dungeon heart to learn where she was needed most urgently.

A mixed group of three orcs, three trolls, and ten goblins waited in lose formation around a reaperbot, their gaze following the sounds of excavation moving around on the other side of the dungeon wall.

"Where the hell are those imp morons?" Lorn, the largest of the trolls, asked while tapping the tip of his club against the ground impatiently. "They better get here soon or the midgets will dig straight past us!"

Kner shrugged his shoulders, not all that disappointed about the prospect of missing an opportunity to risk life and limb in battle.

"Don't worry. They are totally lost. They moved past us twice since we got here," another troll said. "Think the Empress did something to them?"

"Nah, too drunk to dig in a straight line!" Lorn quipped, to the approving laughter of his companions. "Still, the stupid imps should hurry up. It's been too long since I got to fight something for real," he said, baring his teeth.

"Bleh. Having to take them alive takes all the fun out of it," a smaller troll in leather armour complained, glowering with evident disgust at the throwing nets and blunt weapons the group was armed with.

"Half dead still counts as alive," the third orc pointed out, grinning. "Also, try not to crack up too much when we give them the Empress' warning."

"No promises, boss," the troll who had been quiet until now commented, smirking and crossing his arms.

"Hah!"

"Bah, as if they'd ever believe we'd let them go anyway!"

"Yeah, I have no idea what the Empress is thinking," Lorn grumbled, shaking his head.

"Big surprise."

"Who ever does?"

The goblins just snorted.

"I mean more so than usual," Lorn amended. "I mean, usually when she does stuff, you can still kind of see it's going somewhere, even if you have no idea where. But, uh, letting those ugly dwarfs leave if they flee? What's the point?"

"Empress really want them go away?" one of the goblins guessed.

"Quiet, idiot," the leather-clad troll muttered, prompting the small green creature to hide from his glare behind the reaperbot.

"The live capture part makes sense, annoying as it is," the boss orc mused. "She'll need more warriors to take on their kingdom, and turning their own against them just makes the victory sweeter."

"Sure, but that's not what I was asking. Why let some get away?" Lorn insisted.

"They carry home horrible disease?" the goblin tried again.

The others fell quiet for a moment.

"The goblin said something that actually made a bit of sense," the troll in leather admitted after a while, scratching his head. "Huh. I sure hope we won't catch it, too."

"No. I refuse to believe her plan is so simple that someone like him can figure it out," Lorn said, pointing his thumb at the green creature. "Kner, you are good at this thinking thing, what do you figure? Kner? Hey, Kner?" the other orc elbowed him to catch his attention. "What are you spacing out about there?"

"Just trying to figure out what the dwarfs are doing." He didn't believe for an instant that they didn't know where they were going.

Several passes in the same area by necessity meant that a larger volume of rock had been excavated. A staging area for a larger assault? A place to assemble one of their drills? None of the possibilities he was coming up with made him want to be at the forefront of the battle.

"Look, they are finally trying to break through!" Lorn shouted excitedly, pointing with his club at a spot down the corridor where dust trickled from the ceiling.

"We'll hit them as soon as they get through. The big bucket here," the boss rapped his knuckles against the reaperbot, "leads the charge and knocks them over. We clobber and truss up the rest."

There were general sounds of agreement with the plan, and Kner didn't object. Any plan where he had a reason to arrive late to the front line was a good one in his book.

He heard a sizzling noise, followed by a muffled yelp, and the lights wavered and dimmed.

"What was that?"

"Must have dug through one of the magic thingies in the walls," the troll in light armour guffawed.

"Just how fucking drunk are they? That's no way to make a breach!" Lorn complained when the dwarfs didn't create an opening, but instead started lengthening the weakened section towards the left and right wall.

"What are they doing, Kner?" the boss asked with a sideways glance.

The shape of the damage gave Kner the mental image of the corridor as a log and the dwarfs as an axe that chopped it in half. "Making a vertical cut through the tunnel," he speculated as hammering blows continued dislodging tiles from both floor and ceiling. "Maybe they think that will turn off the traps."

"Will it?"

" Yeah, some that - oh crap!" It suddenly occurred to him that he didn't know how long the dwarfs had been at work here before his squad had arrived. His feet started moving before he had completed the thought. "Run!"

"What the- ? Get back here you damn coward!" the boss shouted after him as he sprinted away from the prospective breach.

The stone underneath Kner's feet vibrated, producing a long, grinding groan that came from all around. He stumbled as the floor bucked. Sometimes being right sucked. The dwarfs really had undermined the corridor, and now it was coming loose at the cut they made.

A crumbling, breaking noise behind him accompanied the moment when the floor dropped out under him for real. For an instant, he felt weightless - not that he appreciated the feeling. He should probably brace for impact and protect-

Ow. Something snapped in his foot, sending lances of pain up his right leg, and the noise of the corridor crash-landing was deafening. Stunned, he needed a moment to regain his senses. He was face-down on the uneven ground, one foot probably broken, with what looked like one of his teeth in the dust not far away. His other leg felt numb from the knee down, which couldn't be good.

Small debris shifted underneath him as he slowly turned his head towards the ceiling. Riddled with cracks, missing tiles and crystals, the corridor nevertheless remained in one piece. He needed to move before the dungeon's fortification magic faded away entirely and he got turned into a bloody pancake by collapsing masonry.

Given his injuries, he'd need help. Crap. With painful effort, he sat up to face the chorus of whimpers and moans coming from further down the fallen corridor.

His companions, too stupid to follow him when he had started running, were still more or less in the same place he had left them. Well, they were now a few paces deeper down and scattered all over the floor. Or smeared over the floor, in the case of the goblins that had cushioned the reaperbot's fall.

The ones that hadn't been flattened seemed to be in better shape than him, though. One advantage to being light and small. Not that they'd be winning any prizes at running or jumping soon. Or at fighting, which was kind of bad since a bunch of ropes were now dangling down from the broken edge of the corridor.

He looked over at the reaperbot. With its legs damaged, the thing was flailing around uselessly, a danger only to its nearby allies. Not helping.

A short figure, surprisingly mobile despite the intricate suit of full plate armour it was wearing, slid down the central rope. The dwarf took a few steps forward and stopped in front of the closest goblin, who began crawling backwards. "Survivors," she noted, her voice carrying through the underground as two squat warriors in simpler armour landed behind her.

The blade of her weapon whistled through the air in a bright arc, blood fountained, and a severed green head dropped to the ground.

"Get to work," she ordered, her voice even. Following her lead, the soldiers drew their weapons and strode toward the injured monsters.

"You fucking bitch!" Lorn yelled as the dwarfs approached. "Scared of a real fight? Come here if you dare!" Leaning against the wall, he managed to use his club as a crutch and raised himself to his feet.

The leader looked at one of her men and tilted her head in the large troll's direction.

"What, send an underling to do your job? I thought you surfacers were supposed to have honour! Get your smelly arse over here you -" his eyes widened when the soldier in question pulled out a crossbow from behind his back and got closer, staying just out of the troll's reach.

Lorn tried to duck but was too slow, and the bolt made a sickening squelching sound as it entered his skull through his eye. He collapsed, limbs twitching in his death throes.

Kner shuddered. Right now, he was really glad he had run and was the furthest away from the invaders.

"Your Majesty, I require a recharge for my staff," Torian said as he approached Ami from the side, weaving through the messengers and assistants that surrounded her. "I'm happy to report that I have neutralised yet another group of invaders."

Wordlessly, Ami reached out and put her hand on the proffered weapon. Still concentrating on the map before her, she let power flow into the staff until she could feel resistance from its internal reservoir.

"Thank you, your Majesty."

Fighting was going on around several of the breaches, but there were no serious enemy breakthroughs yet. Imp under attack - already too late to save. A water basin broken open, washing away her own troops. Ami quickly patched the leak with a freezing spell. Jail break alert?

She took a closer look at that one. Oh, just one of the prisons that Jadeite had turned into regular corridors, complete with traps, and then reverted to their true form once the dwarfs were inside. Another group of invaders was trying to get them out. She foiled the escape attempt by transporting the captives to a prison deeper within her dungeon. Now -

Massive damage to her dungeon, some deaths, followed by more deaths. Alarmed, she rushed to the site. She found a fallen, crumbling section of corridor and was just in time to see a dwarf swing his pickaxe at an injured troll, who saved his head by sacrificing an arm to block the blade.

She reacted almost on pure reflex, bringing out her Keeper hand and batting away the offender. When the dwarf went flying and the hand dispersed into a spray of droplets, she realised she had perhaps overdone it. Hoping that she hadn't accidentally killed someone, she turned her attention to the crossbow-wielding enemy who was hanging back. No wards. A quick energy drain later and he collapsed to his knees. Now to tend to the wounded.

Wait, there was a blood-covered orc barely managing to lift his upper body off the ground with one arm. His other hand was holding a dagger and stabbing frantically at a prone dwarf. Ami felt her heart skip a beat before she realised that the victim's armour was holding, at least against the dagger. The rock embedded in her side could only have been thrown by the half-disabled reaperbot.

She lightly slapped the orc's dagger away and whisked the two heavily injured dwarfs away to abbot Durval, eliciting an enraged roar from her underling. Next, the crippled orc and his detached arm went to Monteraine, and then she transported the remaining wounded to Snyder.

Having rescued the survivors of that incident, Ami compared her mental image of the dungeon with the map of incursions before her. With the collapsed corridor as the final piece of the puzzle, the hit-and-run skirmishing tactics of her opponents were suddenly making sense.

"Complete eradication," she muttered under her breath.

"Your Majesty?" Torian asked. His expression brightened. "Do you wish me to wipe out-"

"It's what the dwarfs are trying to do," Ami elaborated. "They aren't heading straight for the dungeon heart, they want to destroy the dungeon piece by piece!"

"Is that even possible?" the warlock asked incredulously.

"It's an approach I had dismissed as impractical," Ami admitted. "In economic terms, it doesn't make sense to maintain an army of imps large enough to pull it off successfully."

"But dwarfs don't require mana and dig just as well," Torian pondered, raising a finger to his chin. "Staying on the outside of the dungeon whenever possible would be far safer than any intrusion." He stayed quiet for a moment. "But that would all be futile in the end unless they could claim territory?"

Ami grimaced and blocked a passage with ice before she answered "They are reaffirming their ownership of these lands. Symbols stamped into the walls." She figured they were emblems of local lords, as each of the three main thrusts was using a different one. In any case, they conveyed enough authority that her own reclaiming efforts slowed down to a crawl.

"Stamps, really? I see." Torian voice seemed to convey a degree of contempt. "If you wish to concentrate on the challenging problems instead, I will be more than happy to deal with this issue for you, your Majesty."

"Please do," Ami blurted out immediately, relieved that someone apparently had a solution. Her own would have involved exposing imps to enemy fire as they desperately tried to deface the offending emblems. In light of the dwarfs' strategy, she needed to check on the south-eastern part of the mountain as soon as possible. So far, it had been mostly quiet aside from imps being attacked. What were the dwarfs up to that they had avoided drawing her attention? She had to-

"Mercury, some help up here?" she suddenly heard Cathy's telepathic message. "Largest wave of enemies yet coming straight for my position!"

Last edited: May 27, 2017

Surface Battle, Part 1

Originally on 2014-05-16T17:07:00

Freezing rain poured down on the battlefield, a rocky slope where clouds of unnatural mist billowed over the sparse grass and moss. Rainwater ran downhill in meandering trickles, cascading off rocks as it searched a path through the uneven, debris-covered terrain. Worse, it found its way into the clothes and armours of the combatants, soaking them to the bone.

Cathy was no exception. Shivering from the wind chill, she landed close to a dwarf, splashing him with the mud fountaining up around her feet. The startled soldier had barely begun turning his head in her direction when her punch rattled his breastplate, lifted him off his feet, and launched him downhill.

The swordswoman did her best to ignore the hint of guilt in the back of her mind. He'd bowled over the dwarfs behind him, so he landed softly and would be fine. Probably. Damn, she hated having to hurt good guys. Fighting off heroes who had come to drive a Keeper from their land wasn't something she had ever imagined herself doing. Not so long ago, she would have reacted with violence to the suggestion she would ever do such a thing.

"Boss! Help!" An orcish voice drew her attention to the right.

Through a wall of dwarfs, she caught a glimpse of two of her soldiers standing with their backs to a rock wall. The orcs in damaged, blood-covered armour didn't look as if they could hold out much longer. "On my way!" she called, her shout distracting the dwarfs and buying the orcs a few more moments.

Alerted by her shout, five enemies broke from the encirclement and faced her way, watching the fog intently. The warriors wore breastplates and mail shirts that didn't fit quite right, but they were professional enough to react quickly and drop into proper combat stances. Their eyes went wide when Cathy got close enough that the mist no longer concealed her form. "Black knight!" one of them warned, taking a step back.

It didn't help him at all when she closed in and swung her long-handled maul at leg height. With one foot steadied against the rock for leverage, she brought the strength of her powered armour to bear and swept all of them aside, sending them sprawling.

The rest of the dwarfs gasped at the sight and hurried to turn towards the new threat. "It's her! Get her!" one of the them shouted as he lunged at her with his pickaxe held high.

Cathy intercepted him with a kick to his chest that sent him back the way he had come. She followed him with a jump, landing between the orcs and the remaining dwarfs. Risky, but she should be fast enough.

"Argh! She's-"

"Go! Togethe-"

Wielding her weapon like a staff, she held it horizontally and pushed forward. Metal rang as the haft of her weapon slammed into a hastily-formed wall of shields. With her armour granting her the strength of a horned reaper in addition to Mercury's own enchantments, she simply kept walking, shoving the grunting, resisting dwarfs backwards. With only three steps, she had gained enough speed to send them tumbling, the sloped terrain working in her favour.

Three dwarfs remained and backed away. Two broke and ran, but the one further back blew twice into a signal horn as he retreated. "She's over here!" he managed to call out before she slammed her fist into his jaw.

Quickly, she checked whether any of the dwarfs scattered in the dirt around her were getting up again, doing her best to ignore their moans of pain and cries for help. Any bones she had broken should keep them safely out of the fight. It was for their own good, in a way. Oh, and someone had risen to his feet and was staggering towards her.

He didn't get far, as one of the bloodied orcs she had saved slammed his club into the dwarf's thigh from behind. A sickening crack later, and he was writhing on the ground, howling in pain as he held his leg.

The orc grinned at Cathy and gave her a thumbs-up as he kicked the downed dwarf for good measure.

With the orcs watching her back, the swordswoman used the opportunity to catch her breath for a moment. She renewed the Shabon Spray fog covering the battle and then let her aching arms dangle. Her powered armour was great and all, but when it moved at inhuman speeds, it sometimes felt as if it was trying to rip her limbs out.

"Thanks for the save, boss," one of the pink-skinned warrior said as got close enough to be heard over the noises of the battlefield. He raised his helmet's visor, a scowl furrowing his oversized brow. "We should leave. Bunch of midgets coming here. Must have heard the horn."

"I'm aware." A loose double line of twenty dwarfs stomping directly towards her was hard to miss. "I'll handle them. You two, head over there." Cathy pointed at a horned metal figure that towered over the other nearby combatants. Crowded by enemies, it was at the centre of one of the skirmishes that made up the ill-defined front line. "Stop them from slipping past the bot!"

"Sure, boss." With a final worried glance at the dwarfs running toward Cathy, the orcs saluted and ran off.

The enemies arrived, and Cathy leaned to the right, letting a blow whistle past her. A knee to the chin sent her attacker stumbling backwards.

"Flank her!"

Cathy didn't give them the opportunity. She swung her weapon at the first soldier trying to bypass her on the left. Shield and bone crumbled under the impact of the blurring maul, and her opponent fell, howling in pain. An axe blade scraped over her greaves as she darted back out of reach, almost tripping her.

More cautious, she continued her attack, felling an enemy with each strike. She wondered how many casualties it would take to make the dwarfs break off their assault. The bulk of their forces hadn't even engaged yet. There were too many dwarfs on the slope for her to properly count, but at a rough estimate, she was facing more than there were goblins in the dungeon. Which would put their number at around four hundred or so.

She wished, not for the first time, that Mercury could have sent her more than twelve reaperbots. That would make her feel more confident about her forces being outnumbered four to one, which was never good. Especially when over half of said forces were goblins.

A dwarf kneeling in the mud over a fallen comrade froze in terror as she skidded to a halt near him. She strode past without a second glance. Even without Mercury's orders, she wouldn't lower herself to go after enemies who were recovering wounded and stunned comrades.

"She's coming this way!"

As long as she didn't let herself get surrounded, defeating the soldiers who opposed her was - well, not effortless, since the powered armour put quite a strain on her body, but not too challenging either. She would have been causing a terrible bloodbath if she had been using an edged weapon.

"Fall back!"

Likewise, the reaperbots didn't have any scythe blades attached to their hilts. She watched one of them spin in a circle with his staff held out, batting away any surrounding dwarfs that didn't dodge in time. More dwarfs poured in from behind it, hacking at the back of its knees. Most of their blows just bounced off the metal without doing any damage.

"Regroup! She has to make a mistake at some poin- argh!"

She stepped over her latest unconscious foe. About forty enemies per reaperbot. So far, she had only lost one of them, and that was to a freak hit from a catapult. Umbra should be dealing with the remaining artillery emplacements, so that wouldn't happen again. Add to that the advantage of high ground and the banks of Shabon Spray fog, and Cathy was feeling optimistic about her defensive line holding.

"Shoot her! Shoot her now!"

"I would if I could see her!"

"You are going to hit our own men in this mist!" someone else protested.

One of the heavy automatons slipped in the mud, its metal soles poorly suited for the rough terrain. It toppled, and a few of the more courageous dwarfs capitalised on the opportunity by giving it a good shove. The construct started rolling downhill, grasping futilely at the ground and picking up speed like a miniature avalanche. With shouts of alarm, the dwarfs in its path scattered.

Cathy grimaced. Well, the defence would hold unless something like that happened. Assuming that the reaperbot survived its descent, it still wouldn't make its way back up soon enough to be useful. She broke into a run, intending to take its place at the front.

"Aiiie! It's her! She's unstoppable! Run! Run!" One of the dwarfs shouted as he spotted her, turning tail and fleeing.

Well, she certainly didn't mind dwarfs not getting in her way for a change.

"Don't panic! Just handle her like one of the tin cans!" contradicted a calm voice that was used to commanding.

Treat her like one of the reaperbots? Hah, they'd find out to their detriment that she was much more agile than the automatons. Cathy turned her attention to the speaker. Clearly an officer of some sort, wearing an armour engraved with decorative line patterns.

"For Nimbadnur! Charge!" the dwarf pointed forward with his massive axe, a two-handed weapon with a half-moon shaped blade that was designed purely for battle.

Air whistled past Cathy as she jumped over the incoming tide of murderous, armoured dwarfs and headed straight for their commanding officer. Breaking the enemy morale was more important than taking down a few more of the rank and file soldiers. Not to mention safer than wading straight into the thick of things.

To his credit, her opponent didn't flinch at her approach. His horned helmet only covered his face from the nose up, and she could see him press his lips together in determination. "Split, scatter, surround!" he instructed as he took a wide-legged stance, the six braids hanging off his chin bobbing.

"Sir!"

"Baron!"

Cathy smiled under her helmet as she heard the worried exclamations. A captive dwarven noble could be just the hostage Mercury needed to put an end to this fight! With a glance, she evaluated her opponent. Weight shifted forward, hands far apart on the handle of his weapon. Yeah, he was planning to parry, rather than dodge. Without warning, she launched herself forward.

As she had expected, her opponent raised his own cleaver, one hand steadying the back of its blade to catch the blow on its edge.

Their weapons clashed, screeching as she pushed through her opponent's block. The effort drove him down to one knee, and even she felt a little rattled and unbalanced.

With a wet splash, the mallet-shaped top half of her maul landed in the mud.

Blinking at the remaining half of her weapon, Cathy belatedly realised that she had not actually broken through the noble's defence. Or batted his axe out of his hands. With a curse, she ducked just in time to get a great close-up view of its blade as it whistled past her head. A band of light blue metal glittered along its edge where the paint had been scratched.

Someone with an adamantine-lined weapon could parry with the edge, Cathy thought sourly. The thing would also cut through her armour, and she back-pedalled rapidly out of its reach. Which brought her in range of the dwarfs she'd bypassed earlier. Keeping one eye on the dwarf leader, she whirled around to parry a blow from behind. The enemy pickaxe came to a stop against the handle of her destroyed weapon, and she grabbed the pick-shaped part to pull it from her opponent's hand.

He didn't let go. Attached to his armour with a locked gauntlet, the pickaxe remained stuck to her opponent. Too pressed for time to abandon her plan, Cathy yanked hard, pulling the soldier off his feet, and swung him in a circle. Feet flailing in the air, the screaming dwarf proved to be effective at gaining her some space, since his comrades were reluctant to hit him.

She let him go before she could get dizzy from all the turning, releasing him in the direction of the dwarven noble. Now to retreat and find another weapon before the dwarfs could close in again.

Someone tossed a net over her. Annoying, but she could just rip that apart before the dwarfs closed in and - wait, they were running away from her?

Cathy's eyes widened. Not fleeing from her, but from the small round object rolling in her direction. Bomb!

She tripped as she took an instinctive step back, her legs tangled in the net. "Crap! Shabon Spray Freezing!"

Magic borrowed from the empress rushed through her body and shot towards the explosive. The pillar of blue light rushing from Cathy's palms solidified as it struck the ground, turning into a wall of ice that towered over her.

The bomb struck the obstacle with a soft thud and exploded with a painful, deafening boom, accompanied by an orange flare. Shards of metal made buzzing noises as they shot through the air, and splinters of ice pelted the swordswoman.

She sat up and stared at the crack-covered wall, her heart beating rapidly. Damn. That had been too close. She had been lucky Mercury hadn't been drawing on their shared mana source at the same time. Damn dwarfs. Still, she had to act confident. They wouldn't flee if she couldn't demoralise them. She stood, demonstratively brushing the dirt off her armour. "So much for your brilliant plan," she mocked.

"The distraction, anyway," the noble quipped right back. Then, he gave the large, precariously-balanced boulder tied to the net a good kick.

Five staff-wielding silhouettes stood in a semi-circle around a stone altar, backlit by the ember-filled braziers that bathed the room in a red light. Each of the high-collared figures occupied one point of the vaguely star-shaped diagram etched into the floor.

The dark general floating on the opposite side of the ritual chamber looked less than impressed. Arms crossed, he singled out the central warlock with his stare. "Torian. I hope you have a good reason for calling me away from the battle."

"Obviously." The chief warlock's tone made it clear he would have rolled his eyes at the dark general if he had dared. "We will ruin the enemy's foolish strategy in one fell blow! Observe!"

He gestured with his staff at the three metal rods standing upright on the altar, resting on their disc-shaped base. They toppled and revealed each a different emblem on their dusty underside.

"Those things," Torian lectured, "are three of the stamps the invaders use to mark the walls, not unlike a noble pressing his seal into wax. A crude but quick way to reinforce their leaders' claim on the land. Instead of a skilled artisan chipping away with a chisel for hours, any soldier with a stamp and a hammer can leave marks all over the place. That has to be delightfully offensive to dwarven sensibilities, really! Still, it accomplishes what they are trying to do."

Jadeite glanced briefly at the stamps before focusing on the warlock again. "The point being?"

"So impatient! Well, as fast as their method is, it suffers from an exploitable flaw. Each stamp produces identical marks. Are you following me?"

"I'm familiar with the weaknesses of mass-produced garbage," Jadeite said, nodding.

"Good. So are the dwarfs, annoying little midgets that they are. They are using differently-sized stamps, paint, and scratches to add some individuality to each mark. That doesn't offer anywhere near as the protection that properly hand-crafting the things would," the warlock furrowed his neatly-trimmed brows, "but that is, unfortunately, still enough to prevent us from blowing up all of the emblems with a single ritual."

"And you have found a way to keep the energy of the spell focused despite the counter-measures?" Jadeite asked, sounding a little more interested.

Torian shook his head. "Not exactly, but I have found a workaround. While we can't directly affect the marks, we can still use each of them to find all the others. After that, well, that's where you come in."

Three of his assistant warlocks took a step forward, grabbed one stamp each, and brought them down hard on the altar. It's surface rippled like liquid tar, and when they lifted the tools again, three perfect emblem-shaped impressions were left in the black glass.

The fourth warlock approached and dropped a nail into the centre of the triangle formed by the three impressions. Aside from having been split half-way until it resembled a tiny tuning fork, it didn't look any different from regular nails one might find in a carpenter's toolbox.

Jadeite raised an eyebrow. "I don't sense any magic from that."

"That's because it's not magical," Torian said. "I assume duplicating it will be no problem for someone who can conjure up thousands of fully-functional eyes?" Not waiting for an answer, he continued "Now go ahead and use the emblems to sense where their copies are. We have a battle to turn around!"

Ami had her eyes closed, her lips pressed together in a thin, unhappy line. In her mental view of the dungeon, steel girders slammed into place, reinforcing a ceiling that groaned under the weight of the rock above it. Her opponents had no compunctions about digging into the load-bearing parts of the mountain, keeping her distracted with staving off collapses while people were fighting and dying elsewhere.

Drawing entirely on the gold-fuelled magic of her dungeon heart, she filled the concerned caverns with the caustic, corrupted version of her her fog. Alarmed cries and rapid footsteps rewarded her as a group of dwarfs spotted the hazardous obstacle and ran. Area denial was the key here.

"The updated list of highest-priority emergencies, your Majesty," one of the warlock assistants interrupted her train of thought.

Ami glanced at the small page of paper he'd left on the battle map, and quickly worked her way through each item, moving troops and the wounded.

By now, she had a managed to piece together a much better idea of what her enemies were up to. The half of their army participating in the assault, anyway. There were three distinct groups digging into the mountain from different directions, each one under the command of a different noble. At least, that was what she concluded from the markings on their equipment. It would explain the differences between their tactics.

The group to the south-west, for example, was trying the most traditional approach. Large groups that breached the dungeon walls and invaded. In a way, they were the easiest to deal with, since there were less separate incursions to track. Her troops could team up and deal with the incursions more or less on their own. Of course, that didn't paint the whole picture, since the enemy had also brought heavy mining equipment, such as large drills that needed several dwarfs to operate. Originally, they had tried to go in deep, but a few hit and run attacks by Mareki had flooded their descending tunnels, which put a stop to that.

"That runaway wagon just exploded!" someone shouted on the upper floors, and Ami was forced to spend a few precious seconds running damage control.

The saboteurs from the east were taking the opposite approach from the previous group. Small teams of three dwarfs each were roaming about, destabilising large volumes of rock, placing explosives and sniping any imps they could find. In short, they were making as much trouble for her as the other two groups put together. She had no reason to assume that they numbered less than their allied forces either - about five-hundred dwarfs each, by her estimations. It explained why she found it impossible to keep track of all the tiny squads. Their one redeeming feature was their lack of combat power. Too small to risk confrontations, they focused on property damage, rather than on inflicting casualties.

Ami wanted them gone nevertheless, and had picked up on their main weakness. With only three dwarfs to rotate through the strenuous task of digging, they lacked endurance. Even the various potions they were carrying could only slow down how quickly they tired out. It meant that whenever she forced them to make a detour, they couldn't move much further to find an alternate target.

Corrupted Shabon Spray fog was great for denying them the use of existing tunnels, and since she had observed the dwarfs being very good at avoiding such hazards, she didn't even need to feel guilty about using the horrible stuff. That was a reactive measure though, and didn't really stop them from collapsing her tunnels. For that, she had been improvising.

She concentrated, and gold flowed from her treasure chamber. The section of dungeon floor she was focusing on trembled, tiles parting and lifting as an elongated shape rose from below with a grinding noise. A giant sword glittered on the ground, but not of the type she had wielded with her Keeper hand before. She had adapted her sword room to produce a thin, narrow weapon that resembled a foil or spike instead. Less practical for cutting down enemies, but she didn't plan on using it for fighting. Instead, she drove the metres of pointy metal right into the dungeon wall.

In practice, she wasn't doing anything more sophisticated than sloppily nailing her corridors to the underlying rock. It wasn't a perfect solution by a long shot, and she couldn't afford either the attention or the gold to turn every corridor into something that resembled a porcupine, but it stopped the dungeon from collapsing the moment it was undermined. Now she needed to build more-"Mercury, help!"

The urgency in Cathy's transmission startled Ami, immediately drawing her Keeper sight to the area. She gasped when she saw the armoured figure skidding and bouncing downhill at a break-neck pace, dragged onward by a rolling boulder. "Oh no!"

Frightened for the blonde's life, Ami concentrated and transported her out of the net by transferring her into Keeper storage. Momentum. Too much momentum to just drop her off in the infirmary. It needed to be bled it off first, and quickly. Aiming for a deep water basin, Ami released the swordswoman.

A loud splash later, Cathy was underwater and slowed abruptly. She made jerky swimming motions while bubbles escaped from her helmet. With the way she was flailing her limbs, they probably weren't broken, and Ami transported her to the infirmary.

Cathy dropped to her knees, coughing so much she bent over, and water spilled out of her armour's joints.

Ami noted the mild pink tinge of the growing puddle with worry. "Cathy, are you all right?"

The coughing from underneath the helmet grew angrier, but also less intense as the blonde straightened. "What does it," another cough, *"look like?"*she snapped, though she stood up under her own power. "Sorry. I've felt better, but I'm really angry about falling for that trick."

"That's a relief." Ami clasped her hands underneath her cloak. "Just let Snyder heal you, and-"

"No, send me back," Cathy demanded. "I can still fight!"

Ami blinked. "But you are hurt!"

"The enemy won't take a break just because I'm not in top shape. We'll lose before I get out of this armour and back in!"

Ami hesitated. She didn't want to send Cathy out to fight wounded, but the swordswoman had a point. It was a painful reminder that she was neglecting urgent duties while she was having this conversation. Besides, someone able to cast Shabon Spray out there on the battlefield would indeed be invaluable. She hung her head. "All right, but be careful, please!"

"I will. Can you drop me off near the breaches?"

Ami searched the battlefield for a spot behind friendly lines and complied, but not before noticing that her troops were precariously close to being overwhelmed. Even armed with magic, Cathy wasn't going to turn that situation around all on her own.

Deciding that she needed to assist, Ami briefly checked if there were no higher-priority emergencies. She stabilised a pillar damaged by an explosive charge before turning her attention to the tunnels underneath the surface battle. There were traps that should have prevented a situation like that. Why were they not working?

Power failure. She sighed. She could fix the broken power lines, if she took the time to search where they were damaged, or she could improvise and throw some magic at the problem to make it go away. Or, more precisely, a magical minion. A mere exertion of her will summoned a pale grey figure before her.

"Ehh? Your Majesty!" The hairless, fin-eared youma seemed to shrink under Ami's red-eyed gaze.

"Lishika! You'll help Cathy stop the enemy on the surface," Ami said, half of her attention occupied with rewiring the power grid.

"M- me? But I'm not good at fighting!" Lishika protested quietly, eyes shifting left and right as if looking for an escape route.

Ami finished her preparations. "After I transport you, you will see a vertical metal rod. Grab it and keep zapping it when Cathy tells you to," she instructed.

The youma relaxed a little. "All right. How long do I need to-"

"Now!" Ami instructed, and Lishika disappeared.

Problem hopefully handled, Ami dealt with a request for evacuation from a flanked group of trolls while she pondered how to best deal with the third group of invaders, which used middle-sized teams of soldiers. Perhaps they could be denied entry?

Last edited: Sep 9, 2016

Surface Battle, Part 2

Originally on 2014-05-16T17:28:00

"Next!" the voice of the sergeant called out, carrying far in the narrow tunnel. Mosek gratefully lowered his pickaxe and pressed himself against the wall to let the next digger pass. He took off his helmet and raised a proffered wine bottle to his lips, the taste of the liquid washing away some of his tiredness.

"Good work," one of the other soldiers said as he patted him on the back. "We'll be through any moment now."

Mosek wiped the sweat from his brow, frowning. Was that supposed to cheer him up? It didn't. In fact, it was terrifying and he wished he was back at his farm. Scraping lichen off wet rocks wasn't any less exhausting than mining, but at least he wasn't doing it in chafing, ill-fitting armour. Also, there weren't death and torture waiting for him around every corner back home. Military life looked far more glorious from afar.

Hard work aside, his group had been lucky so far. The worst they had encountered was an imp - a hideous creature with grotesquely large, dead eyes, the light on its helmet casting intimidating shadows over its face. Keleb had shot the bloodthirsty little monster before it could go for them, but there were far worse creatures waiting for them underneath this mountain. He shuddered and didn't even want to think about the Dark Empress herself, an evil powerful enough to challenge the plans of gods.

"Put your helmet back on, we are about to-"

There was a loud clang as the miner's pick broke through the dungeon's brick wall and bounced off a steel surface behind it.

"Tangled beards! Where did that come from?" the miner shouted in confusion.

Mosek stared in surprise. He would never have missed sensing that much metal through the rock when he had been at point digging, which meant it was a recent addition. "She knows we are here!" he muttered in a strangled voice, jumping to the obvious conclusion.

"Nah, don't worry, it's just some goblins on the other side," Ashkad reassured him, one of her palms touching the bare rock. The copper-skinned artisan had her eyes closed in concentration. "The obstacle is a plate on rails, like a sliding door. Ingenious."

"I'd admire it more if it wasn't in our way," the sergeant grumbled.

Mosek couldn't help feeling relieved. Enchanted picks could neutralise the reinforcements on dungeon walls, making them no harder to dig through than regular walls. This didn't help a whole lot when all you had was a pick and there was a steel wall in your way. He wouldn't have to enter the dungeon proper just yet. Sure, he knew that the enemy Keeper needed to be stopped - never mind the insistent lies of her minions - and he had no intention of shirking his duties, but he still preferred to avoid danger for as long as possible.

"It's not as if she can afford to armour the entire dungeon," Ashkad said. "We can dig sideways and go around it."

"Pointless. The corridor will be swarming with troops by now," the sergeant dismissed the suggestion. "We need to try somewhere else. Pull back, men!"

Mosek, resting safely at the end of the group, suddenly found itself at its front as it reversed direction. Not that he minded leading them away from the danger.

"And collapse the tunnel, we don't want any enemies pouring in behind us!"

"On it."

Even in complete darkness, the dwarven diggers struck with precision and skill. It only took them a few deft strikes before the rock collapsed inwards, rumbling and stirring up a cloud of dust behind the departing soldiers. As the debris rained to the ground, Mosek thought he heard a quiet clicking noise that came from ahead. "Did you hear that?"

"It's one of those freaky rats with a backpack!" someone shouted behind him. A hurled stone landed close to the animal, and it disappeared underneath some rubble.

"What I heard didn't sound like a rat." If anything, the odd noise reminded him of a millipede. It hadn't been a single, defined sound, but more something like hundreds of small objects striking at the same time. His imagination conjured up an enormous, spindly insect whose legs could touch the tunnel walls in multiple places at once, all at the same time. He shuddered. What a time to be reminded of monsters from ancient myths.

"Stop, there's definitely something wrong," the sergeant said, holding up his hand. "What are those glowing specks?"

The passage looked as if a swarm of red fireflies had alighted on its walls, each one several steps apart from the others.

"I'd say embers, but they are getting brighter," Ashkad said, her voice betraying her unease. "Mosek, watch out! There's one on your stamp!"

Eyes widening, the miner pulled the tool off his back and held it as far away from his face as he could while still getting a good look at the source of the glow. There, stuck between the intricate ridges that formed Count Ornish's crest, he saw an odd nail split half-way down the middle. Faint veins of glowing red energy condensed out of the air and seeped into the iron, which channelled it into the tool below. Even as he watched, the masterfully-crafted lines deformed and ran like water, slowly turning the crest into a blotchy, unrecognisable mess.

His eyes darted back to the tunnel walls, and he paid special attention to the positioning of the glowing spots. His jaw dropped in dismay. "They, they are attacking our territory markers!"

The sergeant rushed toward the closest glowing spot. After a cursory examination, he started cursing loudly, confirming Mosek's speculation.

From far ahead in the tunnel came a very faint rustling noise, like rodents moving in the dark. Dim aquamarine flickers brightened the walls, not unlike clouds glowing from a far-away lightning storm. Despite the pretty colour, Mosek felt dread as he recognised the exact shade of Mercury's dungeon tiles and made the connection with the rat. "The evil one is reclaiming the land! We need to get out of here!"

"Troops, regroup around me," Cathy shouted, waving her arm for attention. She stood on an exposed rock needle, visible from afar - provided you were an ally and could see through the magical mist. Her elevated vantage point also gave her a great view of the battlefield, and the situation wasn't looking good. The majority of the reaperbots under her command was missing, and she suspected that the invaders had used the same trick on them as they had on her. Which, now that she thought about it, was a blatant imitation of Mercury chaining a temple bell to her first reaper. Her own troops had lost ground while she was away, and the dwarfs kept pushing. Right now, they were using their superior numbers to send soldiers around the left and right flanks of her force, preparing for an envelopment manoeuvre.

"Ready," Lishika's telepathic, message echoed in her head, sounding a little uncertain.

Cathy evaluated the situation. By falling back towards her position, her warriors were ceding ground, but they were also lowering the risk of being encircled. She drew an imaginary border through several landmarks she had memorised and determined that all of her forces were on the correct side. "Our troops are in the clear! Go right ahead!" she replied to the youma. Our troops who are still alive, she added in private, spotting several pink and green-skinned bodies lying behind enemy lines. She wouldn't be able to hold this position if Mercury's plan didn't work.

She almost missed the moment when dwarfs started toppling without visible cause, forming a straight line of prone bodies across the enemy formations. Cries of alarm and confusion replaced the regular rhythm of marching boots as the advance faltered before the invisible obstacle. Dwarfs swivelled their heads at a frantic pace, trying to figure out who was attacking them. Those on the ground shouted in pain and confusion, prompting some soldiers to rush forward to assist their comrades. The rescuers fell over too as they moved over the underground corridor, brought low by the electromagnets within pulling on their armour.

Cathy let out the breath she had been holding. The impassible zone had appeared close behind the front line, trapping a manageable number of dwarfs between itself and her troops. Unlike other noises muffled by the mist, her voice carried over the battlefield loud and clear as she addressed the stuck soldiers.. "Dwarfs of Nimbadnur! In the name of Empress Mercury, I order you to lay down your weapons! Those who do will be allowed to leave unharmed!"

A barrage of slurs and insults answered her as the bulk of the dwarven army turned into a sea of raised fists and brandished weapons. The dwarfs actually trapped expressed their defiance less enthusiastically, but none of them looked ready to surrender.

"Yeah, that worked about as well as expected," Cathy muttered to herself. With a sigh, she raised her replacement weapon - she had made sure this war hammer had a steel handle - and signalled her troops. "Soldiers, charge!"

She hopped off her perch and threw herself into the fray. At the front of her forces, she cut a path through the opposition, her sweeping blows hurling dwarfs left and right.

Unable to retreat, they fought with reckless ferocity. One of them threw himself at her without even trying to mount a defence. She knocked him away, but not before his axe had struck a dent into her breastplate. Others tried to circle her and risked taking blows from the orcs behind her just to strike at an unguarded spot.

"Stay away from her, it's pointless!" ordered some dwarf in the back she couldn't see.

Cathy smiled under her helmet. Good. They were recognising the futility of their efforts.

"Take down as many of the others as you can instead!"

Well, crap. It seemed their continued ignorance would have been more useful, after all.

Dwarfs moved away from her, seeking easier opposition. With neither side significantly outnumbering the other, the melee devolved rapidly into a confusing mess of small, clashing formations.

Cathy dispatched another opponent, wondering how to turn the situation more into her favour, when she picked out faint but persistent cheering noises. She turned towards the magnets, dreading to see what her enemies were so happy about.

The cheering got louder, spreading to more throats, and then a bright white light lit up the mist. The noise of the battle lowered a little as its participants turned to look at the phenomenon.

An armoured knight, too tall to be a dwarf, was holding a glowing two-hander up over his head. Around him, the veils of concealing fog ripped apart and vanished like a bad dream. The blade's light faded away shortly after banishing the last of the mist.

All around, the cheering of the dwarfs redoubled. Without the glare, Cathy could make out more details of the figure.

She drew in a sharp breath she recognised the face underneath the open visor. "Mercury! The Avatar is here!"

"What?" Mercury's mental reply arrived at once, and she was talking almost too fast to understand. "Busy. People trapped under cave-in. Can you talk him down?"

"I'll do my best," Cathy promised with a sour look at the figure in shiny armour.

By now, some of her own troops had recognised the Avatar. The goblins wailed in dismay, almost as loudly as the dwarfs were cheering.

Cathy started walking toward the Avatar with fake confidence, and none of her opponents tried to bar her way as she walked closer to their champion.

Yellow cloth draped over Amadeus' full plate mail waved in the wind as he strode forward to meet her, deft steps carrying him right past the dwarven bodies stuck to the ground. The self-satisfied smirk on his lips grew more distinctive.

Cathy stopped a good distance away. She wasn't magnet-proof proof like he seemed to be now. "What are you doing here? You had an agreement with my Empress!" she challenged.

"My duty to prevent further unnecessary bloodshed here takes precedence," he stated, his voice calm and steady, with only the merest hint of an apology in his tone. He narrowed his eyes at the blonde. "Yield."

"Oh, that's bullshit! She's just a victim of circumstances!" Cathy shouted. "The blame for any bloodshed here lies entirely on the dwarfs!" Perhaps the champion of the Light deserved more respect, but right now, she was too angry to care. Damn it, couldn't he let Mercury get a break? She hadn't even fully recovered from all the previous trouble, and the Light had to know what she had recently gone through. The Avatar was supposed to be good and fair, and him siding with the dwarfs here certainly wasn't!

"Yield," Amadeus repeated as he kept striding toward her, shifting his grip on his sword into a ready position.

"Make me!" Trying not to let her nervousness show, Cathy stood her ground. Yeah, challenge the greatest warrior of the world to a fight, she reproached herself. Great job talking him down, by the way.

From her brief battles with Amadeus on the Avatar Islands, she knew that her power armour and enchantments were not enough to even the odds. Okay, he didn't have his mantle this time, so perhaps she could - nah, no use lying to herself. Unless this was an imposter, she was going to get her arse kicked. Not that it mattered. Someone needed to stand up for Mercury, and if it was her - well, Mercury was her liege lord, so she was duty-bound to defend her anyway. The fact that the blue-haired girl had managed to gain her respect just meant she had even less reason to hesitate.

The Avatar moved first, a blur of white and yellow. Cathy blocked his opening swing with the hilt of her weapon and skidded backwards, her feet leaving furrows in the mud.

She noticed a small gash in the steel where she had blocked his sword. Did it have an adamantine edge too? Fuck. She might have to pull her blows in order to avoid damaging her weapon further. Her arms moved on instinct, propelling the war hammer through the air in a whistling arc.

The Avatar took a single step out of its path. She pressed her attack, striking faster. Metal clanged against metal, and this time it was Amadeus who was pushed backwards as he redirected the force of the blow.

Their weapons met again and again, moving almost too fast for Cathy to follow their movements. Both combatants circled each other, vying for position with sudden bursts of motion. With each abrupt change of direction, their boots sprayed wet dirt over the area around them, prompting the surrounding fighters to give their duel an even wider berth.

Cathy, bleeding from a shallow cut in her side, thought that she should be coming out a little ahead in their lightning-quick exchanges. Her opponent was slower than her, if only marginally so. Whatever magic was boosting his speed didn't make him much stronger though, and he opted to deflect her blows, rather than pitting strength against strength. He was also favouring his right arm, where she had managed to land a glancing blow. Still, she didn't get the feeling she was winning. "You are one of the fakes!" she accused him, trying to bolster her confidence.

"My skill alone will suffice for defeating you," Amadeus replied between fast, shallow breaths. "Though it admittedly doesn't grant me enough leeway to go easy on you."

As if to drive his point home, his sword darted at an already damaged section of the armour covering Cathy's abdomen, parting the segmented metal with a screech.

She avoided sudden disembowelment by twisting away from the blade at the last moment, but not before its tip had tasted her blood.

Capitalising on her awkward posture, the Avatar followed up with a cut at her wrist. It failed to penetrate - narrowly - but still rattled her limb inside the gauntlet.

"If it reassures you," he continued, "my healing skills are also sufficient to prevent you from bleeding out once I'm done with you. There was definitely a smug expression on his face. The bastard didn't even take her seriously enough to close his visor.

Under her own skull-themed helmet, Cathy scowled. His damned adamantine-edged sword - she hurriedly moved her face out of its path - would make her die a death of a thousand cuts. How much damage could her armour take before it stopped working, anyway? It was long past time she tried something new.

She drew power from her connection to Mercury's magic, gathering it to her hands. The mystical energy tingled and popped under her skin, and her fingers felt as cold as if she had dipped them into liquid ice. Strangely enough, it wasn't an unpleasant sensation. Now, timing was everything. His sword approached again, almost too fast to see. She barely managed to brush it aside. Too quick. She needed to await a solid parry like - now!

Blue light erupted from her hands as she released the prepared energy. Not a real spell, she just didn't have the time to go through the motions for Mercury's technique. Instead, she tossed the gathered magic out in the right general direction as an uncontrolled spray.

Blue motes sprayed from her hands as if she had tossed a bucket of glowing water at Amadeus, and his eyes widened a fraction. He jumped back instantly, but there was no way he could get away from the expanding blast in time. While moving, he traced a finger along the back of his blade, imbuing it with a faint glow. His enchanted sword hacked through the incoming spray, sucking it towards the weapon in a swirling spiral.

Upon impact, Mercury's magic did what came naturally, and encased the blade in a torso-sized chunk of ice.

Cathy doubted that the Avatar had been going for that result. Neither had she, but it was a still a nice consolation prize. Lacking superhuman strength, he wasn't going to swing that kind of weight around.

He knew that too and let go off the handle without hesitation.

Cathy didn't hesitate either. She lunged, war hammer raised high, and then she was suddenly flying backwards, her vision swimming from a bright flash. A heartbeat later, pain flared up in her back as she slammed into the ground, the impact driving the breath from her lungs. Ow. The world spun around her as she rolled to a stop.

She hurriedly glanced back at the Avatar. He stood within a circle of bare rock, the stone scoured clean of soil and mud. The closest onlookers were wearing the muck as a thin coating, and her goblins and orc whimpered as they rubbed their eyes. The dwarfs seemed unaffected, even if they weren't any less dirty than Cathy's warriors.

She could have kicked herself. Good job forgetting he could fall back on plain old regular light magic even without his fancy special Avatar powers. It wasn't as if he hadn't already showed that by dispersing the mist. Groaning, she pushed herself up into a crouch, keeping her eyes on Amadeus.

Her opponent held out one hand in an imperious gesture, palm facing the sky. Immediately, one of the nearby dwarven soldiers threw him her own pickaxe, which he caught with practised ease. Its edge burst into silver flame as he gave it a testing swing.

Well, crap. Here he came, swooping down on her like a bird of prey made from gleaming silver and fluttering cloth.

Cathy flung herself aside, and the flaming axe bit into the ground instead. Flying pieces of steaming earth pinged off her armour as she swiped at his legs, forcing him to retreat instead of attacking again before she could finish rising to her feet. He darted past her on her left, too fast for her to parry the burning blade completely. She clenched her teeth in pain as it struck her upper arm, the weapon's heat searing her skin through her armour.

Still turning toward him, she used her rotation for a vicious kick - only for his elbow to slam down on her knee. No effect due to her armour, but she wobbled precariously - enough for him to slip past her defences again and slash at her thigh. Ow! This wasn't - her eyes closed reflexively in response to a nearby flash, and she felt the sting of a blow deflecting off her armour. Back-pedalling, she flailed her weapon wildly to gain some room, squinting as she observed her opponent carefully.

This time, she spotted the Avatar's free hand draw an arcane gesture in the air before another flash robbed her of her vision for an instant - and the sudden pain in her sword arm told her that it had been enough for him to slip past her defence again. Another flash, another vulnerable moment, more pain. Cathy found herself giving ground rapidly as Amadeus performed his sequence with precision. Block, flash, blink, pain. Block, flash, blink, pain.

Screw this! She was in neither mood nor shape to deal with this annoying but effective trickery for much longer.

Before the next flash, she made her longest leap yet - away from him and into the unsuspecting crowd. As she sailed through the air, an orb of light flew at her from the Avatar's position, evaporating the raindrops it encountered in its path. Crap, she couldn't dodge in the air! "Shabon Spray Freezing!" She recited hastily, glad once again that Mercury now had enough power to fuel the spell quickly. A focused stream of bubbles shoot from her hands an met the incoming projectile. Both exploded into a shower of hailstones, which Cathy ignored it in favour of preparing her landing.

The baffled dwarf she picked as her target barely had time to scream in surprise before she knocked him to the ground and yanked off his warding chain. It was time one of those annoying things worked in her favour for once. Trophy in hand, she returned her attention to Amadeus.

He wasn't hard to find, as nobody on either side of the battle who was currently between them wanted to remain there. As the troops scrambled to vacate the area, she saw that he hadn't been idle while she was mugging the dwarf. His panting had stopped, vanished along with other signs of exertion, and even the sweat on his face was gone.

Now that was completely unfair! Here she was, bleeding, exhausted, and bruised pretty much everywhere, and he looked just as fresh as he'd started out. She wrapped the stolen chain around her wrist with a flick of her hand. At least he wouldn't be able to use abbot-like magical power against her from now on, and he hadn't recovered his sword either. The adamantine-edged weapon was still stuck in an ice block a good distance away. That meant her opponent was weakened to being no worse than Marda in a more suitable body.

She hadn't actually beaten Marda in a fair fight ever.

On the other hand, she had never fought the troll while wearing powered armour either. Cheered by that comforting thought, she launched herself back into combat.

As the clanging of their blades rang over the battlefield once more, she found herself more evenly matched with her opponent now. Still, it was ridiculous that she wasn't getting any telling blows through his defences. He might be the best fighter in the world while she probably didn't even rank among the top thousand, but she was stronger and faster than him! Hell, they were trading blows so quickly that she had trouble reacting to them, even with the all-around boosts that Mercury's enchantments provided. How was he doing it?

Experience. Had to be. He could read her body's movements and pick an appropriate response even before she struck. Could she exploit that, do something unexpected and trick him that way?

She thought of goblins. When you were looking for surprising combat moves, you rarely had to look further than the closest goblin. Mainly because they couldn't tell that they weren't supposed to do the damn stupid thing they were about to try next. This didn't actually make them more dangerous.

Okay, scratch that plan. The Avatar would see through any feint she tried anyway. Maybe she should just ask for help from Mercury? Cathy didn't like that option too much either. Giving up would feel like betraying the trust the young empress had put into her. Not that Mercury would hold it against her, but she wouldn't forgive herself for simply giving up on such an important task. Besides, the teenager was busy rescuing people and would probably blame herself for any deaths that happened while she was distracted.

So, the hard way, then. She'd just have to push herself to the limits and try to wear him down before she passed out from her injuries. Forgoing some defence, she struck as fast and as hard as she could.

The Avatar gave ground, pushed back by the additional force behind her blows. He reacted to her change in tactics by shifting his grip on his pickaxe, turning it so that the pick-shaped part faced her.

Cathy swallowed. Where his axe blade had trouble actually penetrating armour, the solid metal spike of his weapon would go right through if she gave him the opportunity to land a square hit. He had to be counting on her aggressive approach providing him with an opening. Should she reconsider? Jered would disapprove so much of her putting her health on the line like this. She was seriously tempted to let up, but no. She wasn't going to last much longer anyway, and if he pierced her armour, his weapon would be stuck long enough for her to do something. She'd just have to bear the pain and-

The Avatar's silver-wreathed pickaxe broke under the force of her latest blow, catching both of the combatants off-guard.

Amadeus recovered faster from the surprise and stepped into her guard. When had he grabbed her arm? A leg hooked behind her own, and she found herself losing her balance.

No! Cathy yanked the arm he was holding onto upwards, lifting him off the ground. Robbed off leverage, he could no longer complete his throw. She was still toppling forwards though.

Pulling the Avatar even closer, she turned her fall into a vicious head-butt directed at his face. That should teach him to close his visor!

Her helmet collided with his chin and rang like a gong. A very faint flash of light covered his face as it filled her vision, and it felt as if she had just slammed her head into a brick wall. Damn it! She actually bounced back enough to arrest her momentum.

Through the pain-induced haze before her eyes, she saw the Avatar's face rock away from her own as if in slow motion. His gaze met hers, and one of his eyes closed and re-opened as he toppled backwards. His armour rattled loudly as he landed on his back, unmoving.

What?

Cathy blinked dumbly at the still body before her, only vaguely aware that the battlefield was falling quiet around her.

Slowly, a cheer rose from monstrous throats, swelling as more and more of her troops noticed her standing victoriously over her opponent.

"The Avatar has fallen!" shouted a voice shrill with disbelieving terror.

"Save him! Rescue the Avatar!" another nearby dwarf cried out.

Cathy's eyes widened as every nearby dwarf turned towards her and charged with suicidal determination. Legs feeling like molten lead, she catapulted herself into the air and backward, escaping from the converging circle of fanatical soldiers by jumping over it.

Panting, she watched one dwarf kneel down at the Avatar's side while the others shielded him with their bodies, forming a weapon-bristling perimeter around him.

She started to wonder whether or not her opponents were aware that this Avatar was an imposter - she had been too busy previously to think about that - when the kneeling dwarf pulled something from Amadeus' belt.

There was a flicker of white, and a transparent oval rose into the air, waving mildly in the breeze.

During the moment it took Cathy's tired mind to catch up, she wondered why the Avatar would keep a ghost in his bag. She cursed when she finally identified the phenomenon as a hero gate. Already, someone was pulling the Avatar through, his legs and feet being last to disappear. His guardians jumped in after him, prompting a general rush towards the newly-provided escape route.

She raised her hand, signalling her troops to not interfere now that she finally had the dwarfs running. She glanced over at the rest of the enemy troops behind the magnetic barrier.

They hadn't been idle while she was fighting, using thrown ropes and sticks to drag their stuck comrades back to safely. Their movements lacked their initial zeal and determination, though, and they were quieter too.

Cathy returned her attention to the hero gate, which looked dimmer now that most of the dwarfs on this side of the barrier had fled into it. Mercury would not be happy about the gate's presence. On the other hand, she would have been even unhappier if the thing had been carried deep into her dungeon, so Cathy was willing to count this as a qualified success.

Somewhere behind the enemy lines sounded a signal horn. It's noise was repeated by several others further away. Slowly, the warriors behind the barrier started to pull back, gather their wounded, and walk back toward the west.

Cathy almost collapsed to her knees in relief. She had won. The dwarfs were, if not running, then at least retreating. Dimly, she heard the signal being repeated somewhere deep under her feet, too.

"Cathy?" Mercury's mental voice sounded about as exhausted as the blonde felt, but also elated. "The dwarfs are pulling back! Did you manage to convince the Avatar?"

"Uh, about that..."

Last edited: Jul 13, 2016

Battle Aftermath (DARK)

Originally on 2014-09-12T20:37:00

A warlock on the first floor of Ami's command centre turned away from the scrying mirrors that lined the wall behind him. The glowing rectangles cast his face in shadows, hiding his expression. He approached the railing, bowed in her direction, and reported in a confident voice "We have not spotted any more dwarfs approaching the dungeon, your Majesty."

Ami's rigid posture relaxed as some tenseness left her muscles. She dared hardly believe that the battle was finally over. "Acknowledged. Thank you, Halastor." Now she only needed to figure out if this was more than a momentary reprieve. She swivelled her command chair a little to the left, and the crystal ball set in a pedestal before her flared to life.

Within the orb, images of the terrain surrounding the mountain flashed past in rapid succession. She found that the half of the enemy army that hadn't joined the attack had not been idle during the fight. In the dawn's light, she observed a few crude walls in strategic locations, cobbled together from roughly-worked rock. Behind them, workers were crawling all over the foundations of sturdy watchtowers.

She almost smiled at the sight. Fortifications indicated that the dwarfs were preparing for a siege, which meant they weren't about to hit her with a second attack wave of well-rested soldiers. Given the progress they'd made so far, they must have started construction simultaneously with their attack.

She checked, but didn't find any of her claimed territory remaining behind enemy lines, which gave her new insight into the enemy's strategy. She didn't doubt that the dwarfs would have been ecstatic if they had defeated her at once, but in hindsight, they had been going for containment. By cutting her dungeon down to a manageable size around its core, they reduced the length of the perimeter they needed to encircle her claim and prevent it from expanding.

Her mood sank a little when she pondered that the dwarfs would also be waiting for sufficient reinforcements to assault her dungeon successfully. A problem in the long run, but one she would be able to prepare for. The longer the wait, the more her gem production would shift the advantage in her favour. More importantly, in the short term it meant that she had time to recover from the attack.

She stood, drawing attention to herself, and faced her employees on the floors above. "Good work, everyone," she said, a tired smile on her face. "We have won this battle."

On the uppermost floor, the goblins started cheering and dancing on their chairs. "We the best! We the best!"

Ami's gaze darted towards them, her eyebrows lowering into a frown. Right now, she didn't have time for goblin antics. There was the aftermath of the battle to deal with. "Quiet!" she snapped, raising her voice over the noise.

The small creatures froze in surprise, except for the one who lost his balance and fell off his chair.

"I'll keep this short since everyone is tired," Ami continued. Addressing one warlock in particular, she said "Halastor, organise a small crew of warlocks who will continue keeping an eye on the dwarfs. I want to be informed the moment they try something."

"It shall be done, your Majesty."

"Everyone else can go and get some well-deserved rest. Dismissed," she finished, a proclamation that was received with smiles and approving mumbling all around. She stifled a yawn, feeling dead tired too because she had worked furiously all night.

Unfortunately, she didn't have time to rest yet. She had a dungeon to patch up and, more importantly, to make sure nobody else died today. Too many people had already been hurt for no good reason.

First, she closed her eyes and focused her full attention on sensing her dungeon and the imps sprinting through its darkened halls. The echoing patter of their footsteps froze for an instant as they felt her gaze on them and processed their new priorities. A moment later, they dropped their picks and rushed off to get stretchers to recover the wounded.

Speaking of the wounded, she needed to bring Cathy to the healers. The blonde had gone back into battle already injured, and her confrontation with the Avatar couldn't have done her any favours. The instant Ami started worrying about the swordswoman, her Keeper vision zoomed in on her location.

On the muddy, rain-soaked surface, the air vibrated with the sound of orc and troll voices as they chanted Cathy's name. The four largest of the creatures were carrying her on their shoulders, still in her bloodstained armour. A few goblins followed the odd procession, carrying a chunk of ice with a fancy-looking sword stuck inside.

Cathy was waving at the crowd and had taken of her helmet, letting her hair flow free. To Ami, the proud grin on the blonde's bruised face looked quite strained whenever her carriers jostled her.

"Cathy, I'm going to send you to the infirmary" she informed the blonde, not giving her any time to protest as she transported her out of her battle-damaged armour.

"Wha-" Cathy suddenly found herself lying on a soft cot.

Ami paled at the sight of the woman's blood-encrusted and tattered undersuit. There were gashes and rips everywhere, some of them with charred edges. She had fought like that?

Cathy prodded at the wet garment and blinked when her finger failed to encounter metal. "Oh. Thanks. The armour would have been really fun to take off," the blonde messaged with a grimace. "I guess you want the details about the Avatar? He-"

"Later," Ami interrupted gently. Cathy had already done more for her today than could be reasonably expected. "Please, just rest for now."

"Not complaining," the swordswoman agreed and let her head sink onto a pillow.

Ami wished she could ease the blonde's suffering right now, but there were other people who needed help more urgently. Through Cathy's minion bond, she could feel that the exhausted warrior's life signs were stable, even if she wasn't in any fighting shape. One of the healers would eventually get around to treating her wounds.

Reacting to Ami's current interest in her healers, her Keeper sight showed her Snyder. The young acolyte was hurrying from bed to bed and touching his monstrous patients, a soft glow surrounding his hands. Behind him followed a warlock and several bandage-carrying veteran soldiers to provide more mundane first aid in his wake. Not far away behind a curtain, Monteraine was treating the more grievously injured underlings. Currently, the black-haired sorceress had her hands buried wrist-deep in the guts of a pink-skinned troll.

Ami quickly averted her gaze from the operating table, feeling queasy.

Locating the last of the trained magical healers in her dungeon required a conscious effort of will. Being neither a minion nor prisoner, Abbot Durval lacked any connection to the dungeon heart that would have let Ami find him at once. Instead, she knew to look for him a floor below, where the dwarfs were treated separately from her own troops for their own safety.

The abbot looked his age as he reached for the dwarven patient before him, his shaking left hand resting heavily on his staff. Even with a few warlocks assigned to assist him, he looked as if he was about to collapse from exhaustion. Tiger was at his side in her human disguise.

Ami was surprised at her sister's presence, but that was something she would investigate when she didn't need to deal with a number of life signs ebbing away throughout her dungeon.

Immediately, a troll pinned to the ground by a spear through his stomach appeared in her mind's eye. Elsewhere, a dwarf with a shattered helmet rested on a heap of rubble, strands of brown hair matted with dark blood. In yet another corridor, one dwarf on the ground was coughing up blood while a second sat next to him, threatening the gawking monsters around them with his pickaxe. The dungeon heart showed Ami another motionless and dying dwarf, but she couldn't tell at at a glance what was wrong with him. Finally, a group of orcs was staring down at one of their own lying in a pool of blood on the ground, arguing about whether or not moving him would make the bleeding worse.

Ami's heart skipped a beat as she realised she didn't have the means to save all of them in time, and she felt as if someone had doused her with ice water. How was she supposed to decide who got to live or die?

She tried to imagine her mother, a real doctor, in a situation like this. Had she ever had to make such a choice? If so, she had never told Ami about it. Still, the memory of her mother's calm competence helped Ami to snap out of her paralysing indecision. Mother would try to help those who had the best chance at surviving.

Without hesitation, Ami snatched Snyder from the infirmary and dropped him down next to the bleeding orc, not wasting time with an explanation. The nature of the injury - a large axe stuck in the pink-skinned soldier's right thigh - would be as blindingly obvious as its solution was straightforward. Even with the acolyte's comparatively weak healing spells, he should be able to prevent the patient from bleeding out.

Next, she was forced to chose whom she would help personally. The dwarf with the head wound was out of luck, as she didn't think she would be able to put damaged parts of the brain back together properly with her necromancy-based healing spell. Likewise, the dwarf whom she hadn't been able to diagnose moved to the back of the queue, as she would have to spend time figuring out what was wrong with him first.

That left her with the impaled troll and the blood-coughing dwarf, and suddenly, her method of prioritising was no longer applicable. Stabilising either of them would be roughly the same difficulty, so she needed another criteria.

Ami felt torn. On one side, the troll was a soldier in her army, and the dwarf was an opponent. On the other, her underling was a mercenary who had signed up for this, while the dwarf looked like a militiaman with neither the equipment nor the build of a professional soldier. She didn't want to abandon someone who had fought loyally for her, but she also didn't want to let someone die who had been forced into this situation. Most of all, she didn't want to make this decision, but then they would both die. Wringing her hands, she searched for a quick reason to choose one over the other.

Save the soldier so he could fight for her again, or save the dwarf so his death wouldn't give the others more motivation to continue fighting her? Pragmatism wasn't helping, either.

Her mind flashed back to the less injured dwarf who was still protecting his dying companion. Without really wanting to, she imagined herself in his place, trying to defend a dying Usagi, only to later learn that she had been keeping away the medics who could have saved her friend.

With a small strangled noise from the back of her throat, she disappeared, her decision made.

Her troops started when she appeared in a flash of blue behind the injured duo, close enough that the snowflakes from her teleportation swirled around the two dwarves.

"Empress?"

"Your Majesty!"

With a gasp, the dwarf sitting next to his bleeding comrade tried to turn towards the threat behind him.

Ami tapped the back of his neck with an energy-draining touch, sending him off into unconsciousness. While he keeled over quietly, she knelt down next to her patient, touched his face and drew upon her healing spells. She could have tried healing him remotely, but the physical contact helped her sense the composition of his body, greatly improving how accurately she could manipulate the flesh.

The magic mapping out his body immediately confirmed that his lung was damaged, punctured by sharp splinters from a broken rip, and one wing had collapsed.

First, the internal bleeding needed to stop. Ami directed her magic to seal ruptured blood vessels, focusing less on restoring function and more on getting the patient stable enough for transport to the infirmary. She immobilised the broken ribs so they wouldn't move and cause more damage. Their splinters were harder to neutralise. Frowning, she borrowed some cartilage to pad their sharp parts. Someone would need to remove them properly later, but right now, she had to concentrate on keeping the patient alive.

At the edge of her perception, she noticed her soldiers had lowered their weapons and given her some space. The distance didn't prevent them from watching curiously, or from chatting among themselves with low voices. A few of the goblins were whispering.

Ami listened in closer - anything to distract her from the horrible gurgling noise the dwarf made as she drained bloody liquid from his lungs - and had no trouble hearing the words spoken on her own territory.

"Why she healing stupid hairbag? Should be healing me instead!" a goblin who was favouring his left leg whispered to another.

"Is for evil," the second one replied.

"Huh?"

"Not caring about loyal minions is evil. She Keeper. Is obvious."

The first goblin grimaced. "Me no like. That wrong kind of evil! She-"

A female troll rapped both of them on their helmets with her knuckles. "She can hear you, idiots," she said in a sing-song voice.

The goblins gulped and craned their heads to peer closer at their empress. "Why you say that? She not doing anything!"

"Because she wasn't scowling before you started talking," the troll pointed out with unconcealed glee.

Ami realised that the warrior was right and relaxed her facial expression. It had hurt to hear her difficult decision questioned like that only moments after she had taken it. Irritated, she shifted her head a little and briefly glanced in the direction of the green pair from the corner of her eyes.

"Eeep!" the first goblin paled and dived into hiding behind an orc's shield.

The other grabbed him and pulled him back out in the open. "Me very sorry, your Majestic Empress Majesty!" he shouted loudly. "Not sure what wrong, but it all his fault!"

With a drawn-out breath, Ami stood up. A moment of concentration, and her stabilised patient disappeared, only to reappear over an empty bed in the infirmary's emergency wing. Ami lowered him gently onto the soft surface before she turned towards her gawking troops. She gestured at the remaining unconscious dwarf at her feet. "Get him to the infirmary," she snapped, not waiting for an answer before she teleported again. She had to hurry and save as many of the other mortally wounded people as she could!

The sickening smell of ruptured bowels struck her when she arrived next to the impaled troll. The wooden spear haft protruding from his stomach like a macabre flag pole stood completely motionless, not even a tiny quiver hinting at life remaining within the body. Ami had arrived just in time to feel his minion bond dissolve as death claimed him.

She balled her hands into fists, her fingernails digging into her palms. "Darn it!" She had been too slow, too late.

She lowered her head. Did she make the wrong choice by healing the dwarf first? Could she have saved them both if she had stabilised the orc first instead? Should she have taken more of a risk instead of wasting time making sure her patient was stable?

No. Guilt was not productive. Ami clenched her teeth in determination. Those were questions for later. Right now, she needed to focus on more important tasks. How could she save the two remaining wounded?

She could theoretically use her necromancy to glue damaged brain tissues back together, but she had very little control over how the different cells would connect with each other. The result was bound to end up messy and unsatisfactory for everyone involved. Better to leave that to one of the Light magic healers, preferably the Abbot. No, he was busy healing, and she couldn't move him with Keeper transport anyway. Was Snyder done with his patient?

Yes. Well, not really, as the redhead was still kneeling next to his patient, a soft glow from his hands sinking into the axe-free and scabbed-over wound. Nevertheless, the dungeon heart informed her that the orc's condition was no longer deteriorating.

That should suffice. It had to. Ami yanked Snyder through space and dropped him down next to dwarf with the head wound, prompting a surprised sputter from the Acolyte. "Sorry, just get him stable," she sent a telepathic message before she transported herself to the last dwarf.

He was still conscious and made a horrified croaking noise as she appeared before him. In his polished helmet, an ember-eyed reflection with a tattered cloak mirrored Ami's movements as she reached for him. With barely enough strength to lift his hand, the frightened dwarf tried to fend her off.

Ami closed her fingers around his limb and held it firmly, using the contact to initiate her healing spell.

Inner bleeding from blunt impacts, the magic told her at once. Well within her ability to heal, though his heart racing from terror was accelerating the blood loss.

"Don't be afraid, I'm here to help," she comforted the shaking dwarf in a soft voice, which didn't stop him from trying to pull his hand away from hers. Undeterred, she started patching up leaky blood vessels, a comparatively simple task. With a few minutes of concentrated work, she stopped the bleeding.

Her Keeper senses confirmed that the prisoner was no longer dying, and so was nobody else in the dungeon right now. Snyder's two patients remained alive, if very weak.

Ami inhaled deeply before she contacted the acolyte. "Great work, Snyder. Thank you so much!"

"I'm glad I could help," the redhead sent back, the tiredness in his voice noticeable even through the distortions from the communication spell. "Take care to handle the dwarf's head like you would a fragile eggshell when you transport him."

"I'll be careful," Ami promised. "I'm sorry for yanking you from place to place so abruptly, but there was no time to lose."

"No need to apologise, I saw the condition of the wounded. Now, could you give me a lift back to the infirmary, please?"

"Of course." Ami did as he requested and moved on to make transport arrangements for the rest of the wounded. After verifying that there was nothing else requiring her immediate attention, she sat down where she stood and closed her eyes, grateful to finally get a break.

With no emergency to occupy her thoughts, they drifted back to the troll who had died due to her prioritisation.

She sighed, wondering again if she had overlooked a better solution. In any case, he was dead and beyond her help. The only thing she could do for him now was moving the cooling body to the morgue personally, rather than letting the imps do it. It was only a symbolic gesture, but she felt that she owed him that much. With her Keeper hand, she began the grisly task of pulling the spear from the corpse's entrails while she switched her Keeper view to the morgue.

Wait, there were not supposed to be goblins inside the ice-filled room. At least not living ones.

Ami teleported into the large chamber, her breath condensing immediately in the cold air. She had no trouble spotting three green figures moving between the hills of glittering ice inside the room.

Two haggard-looking goblins were clinging to the large, empty barrel they were carrying, fighting to keep their balance on the slippery floor. The third and fattest of the trio had a large cleaver strapped to her belt and was leaning over a dwarf corpse lying on an ice slab, pinching its arms.

"Brugli! What are you doing here?" Ami confronted the leader of the group, getting goosebumps not just from the chill.

The goblin cook turned slowly towards Ami, her mouth widening into a pleased grin. "Empress! Brugli selecting best meat for victory feast! Will be great! Not just boring chicken and eggs!"

Ami's stomach lurched at having her sickening suspicion confirmed. "No, absolutely not! You are completely forbidden from cooking anything you could have held a conversation with!" she shouted, horrified. Cannibalism aside, she didn't even want to speculate about what the dwarfs would think if she let her minions desecrate their dead. What was she supposed to do about their bodies, anyway? Were there special burial rites she would have to follow in order to avoid giving offence?

Brugli blinked and shrugged, making the rolls of fat around her neck quiver. "If you say so. Raw is fine too-"

"No, it's really not!" Ami narrowed her eyes at the goblin, unsure whether she was being mocked or if goblin culture was really that different. "You - actually, anyone - is forbidden from taking anything from this place," she clarified in a tone that left no room for argument.

"But saw your sister taking pieces," Brugli protested, her tone petulant.

Ami gaped. Tiger? But she couldn't- wouldn't want to- Oh. She relaxed as she made the mental connection between Tiger, the infirmary, and body parts. Transplants. She shook her head. "Just get out," she told the goblins and pointed at the door.

The goblins left, Brugli waddling behind her slimmer companions. Their footsteps faded away, leaving Ami alone in the silent hall filled with fresh corpses.

She briefly glanced at the bodies on the frozen slabs and lowered her gaze, unwilling to meet their unmoving, accusing eyes. All of those soldiers, dead because of her. She hadn't wanted any of this. Would it have been better if she had surrendered to the Light gods and avoided all of this fighting?

She felt something wet at the corners of her eyes and wiped it away. What would her friends and her mother think of her when they learned that she hadn't managed to prevent this? She was almost glad it was early in the morning and she didn't have to face them until they got out of school or back from work.

Intellectually, she knew that the fatality rate among the dwarfs had been amazingly low, less than thirty dead when they had attacked with fifty times that number. She still felt she had failed, even though she had proof that things would have been much worse if she hadn't instructed her troops to fight non-lethally. No, especially because she had proof of that. The dwarfs hadn't been pulling their blows, and the dead trolls, orcs, and goblins in the room outnumbered them by a factor of four - a fact that only made Ami feel worse.

She reminded herself that the battle had still been a solid victory in her favour. She had around a quarter of the attacking force locked up in her prisons, while the dead in this room were most of her side's casualties. She paused. That was kind of concerning in itself, now that she thought about it. There should have been more wounded than dead. A skewed ratio like that meant that her opponents had outright killed everyone they could get their hands on.

Some of her sympathy for the dwarfs waned. Yes, she could understand that they felt afraid for their homes and loved ones, but that was no justification for wholesale slaughter.

What should she do with this knowledge, though? Did she need to punish those among her prisoners who were guilty, and if so, how? She didn't know the local laws pertaining to war crimes - if they even existed. In any case, she doubted that the Light condoned the killing of defeated enemies. On the other hand, the Avatar, or at least a good copy, had fought on the side of the dwarfs. Had he been involved in the massacre too, or had it happened away from his eyes? She hesitated and decided that she lacked sufficient information to commit to a course of action.

She needed to ask Cathy about the Avatar and to talk to Snyder about Light-approved conduct in battle. The help of a lawyer could also be useful, so she should question Tiger about how her mission to hire one went - among other things. Actually, it would probably best if she called everyone important together for a proper debriefing.

Last edited: Sep 9, 2016

Informal Debriefing

Originally on 2014-10-11T02:25:00

When Ami thought of a lair, she did not normally imagine a comfortable living room. Nevertheless, that was exactly what the chamber had turned into when she had manipulated it into a comfortable meeting place for the debriefing. Sure, the aquamarine-coloured upholstery ended in some jagged, frost-patterned ornamentations, and some of the seats had proportions not entirely suitable for human occupants, but in general, the place looked surprisingly cosy and refined.

The crude pillar of rock that suddenly appeared on the carpet therefore looked out-of-place in this environment. With a soft rumbling noise, it grew to the size of a man before its surface cracked and shattered, leaving a carrot-coloured youma standing amidst the fading debris from her teleportation effect. Grey powder stuck briefly to the black fabric of Tiger's leotard-like outfit as she stepped out of the short-lived dust cloud.

Ami self-consciously adjusted the collar of her recently re-conjured cloak. The gashes Tiger had cut into her outfit to show off her stripes rendered it a little more daring than the blue-haired teenager was comfortable with.

Tiger looked around curiously until she spotted Ami sitting on the L-shaped couch in the corner and froze when she noticed the other occupant of the room. "What's up with Lizard Girl?" she blurted out, her gaze focused on Ami's right hand.

The limb rested on the bald head of Lishika, who was also lying on the couch, covered by a blanket and motionless except for one of her fin-shaped ears twitching occasionally.

Ami glanced over at the unconscious youma. "She overextended herself when powering the electromagnets. I'm maintaining a low-powered healing spell so she can absorb its mana."

"Really?" Tiger's expression grew speculative. "And here I was hoping it had something to do with how you somehow convinced your corruption to forego its more perverted expressions. Suspicious." She grinned and demonstratively studied the pieces of furniture one by one, as if expecting the various comfortable armchairs and stools to hide scenes of debauchery and deviance.

Ami felt her cheeks heat up, and she reluctantly pointed her index finger up at the thick cloud of Shabon Spray fog that concealed the ceiling. "Up there. I didn't put that mist there only to make scrying on us difficult," she admitted.

Tiger faced the ceiling. "I'm almost curious enough to fly up and have a look," she said. Instead, she approached Ami and plopped down next to her on the couch, making the cushions bounce. "So, what's up?"

"I was happy to see you helping out in the infirmary," Ami said, trying to keep the trickle of magic going to Lishika steady. "Did Abbot Durval tell you what to do?"

"Nah, I know how to heal. I know the same healing spells you do," Tiger said, pointing at her head. "Admittedly, I'm not as good at using them, since I don't have a really awesome dungeon heart doing all the hard parts for me." With a grin, she added in a teasing voice. "You dirty little cheater, you."

"Um." Ami didn't really know how to handle mild sisterly ribbing and settled on not reacting at all. "Well, I think it's really nice that you are helping people," she said. "I didn't know you were interested in healing."

Tiger rubbed the back of her head. "Ah, well, I thought Mum might like it."

Ami smiled. "I'm sure she'll be proud of you! I'm proud of you too. Did you study up on surgery by yourself? The transplants idea-"

Tiger flinched, her face taking on a greenish tint. "Ugh, don't remind me." She pulled her legs up and encircled them with her arms. "That was pretty much Monteraine going 'Hey you, teleporter! Fetch me some spare parts!' and handing me a scalpel and a list. If I ever have to cut and carve around in gross, wobbly, sticky cadavers again... urk." She shuddered and pressed her eyes shut.

Ami blinked "Oh." With her recently gained healing experience, she could all too easily imagine how queasy something like that would have made her. If Tiger felt the same as her, which wasn't much of a stretch since Tiger was partly her, then she needed some comfort. Tentatively, Ami reached with her left arm around her sister and patted her on her shoulder.

Tiger's muscles tensed under Ami's touch, and she froze in surprise. A moment later, she uncoiled and moved quick like a snake.

Ami suddenly found herself yanked into a strong hug, with her sister holding onto her for dear life. Surprised, she hesitated for an instant before reciprocating and putting her arms around the other girl. Not the kind of reaction she had been expecting, but, well, it felt nice and seemed to make Tiger feel better.

After a while of silence, Tiger started shifting and sheepishly muttered into Ami's shoulder. "She's not watching this, is she?" Her eyes were peering into Lishika's direction.

Ami shook her head. "She's unconscious."

Despite that reassurance, Tiger let go and sat up straighter, putting one leg over the other as she leaned back. "Small mercies," she commented. "Oh well, you have to take the good with the bad. "At least the dwarfs were somewhat amusing."

"What?" Now that was a little alarming. Ami couldn't think of anything funny about injured people.

"Well, one moment they were all-" Tiger scowled exaggeratedly and made her voice deeper "- away with your foul necromancy, demon slattern!" In her normal voice, she continued "And then someone would shout at them for being rude to the Dark Princess," she helpfully pointed her thumb at her chest, "and then they'd completely change their attitude." In her dwarf voice, she whined "No, please, your Highness, couldn't you reconsider?"

"Really? That seems odd, given their stubbornness so far." Ami made a mental note of it for later. Perhaps she could get better results if she left the negotiations to Tiger? Speaking of negotiations, that reminded her of the youma's previous mission. "So what did the lawyer say about being able to help us?"

"Oh, that slimy bastard said he was willing to consult with colleagues and compile a list of the various laws governing interaction between ruling entities for us - for a substantially higher fee than normal, of course." Tiger didn't sound too impressed. "He also admitted that dwarven law wasn't exactly his area of expertise."

"Maybe we could get some of the dwarf prisoners to help with that instead?" Ami said, wondering what it would take to get them to cooperate. Distorted information could be worse than useless. "It's a start, at least."

"Oh, I did learn something else, too. The king of Nimbadnur has called on Baron Leopold's assistance to defend his country against you. Apparently, they are allies or something."

"The dwarfs are taking me that seriously already?" Ami wasn't too concerned about Leopold showing up. He was a powerful fighter, but no match for Jadeite, Rabixtrel, or even Cathy. She found it more alarming that the dwarfs felt so threatened by her that they were willing to call upon alliances already.

"Apparently. Hey, it sounds as if the others are about to show up."

Outside in the corridor, voices and footsteps approached. A moment later, someone knocked on the door.

"Come in!" Ami said and made the door swing open.

A palanquin stopped in front of the door, and the four trolls carrying it lowered it so its occupant could get off. Cathy sat up with a motion that was surprisingly smooth for someone wrapped in enough bandages that only a few sections of skin remained exposed. She came in and pulled the door shut behind herself, blocking the view of the curious underlings."Empress," she greeted.

Ami's eyes widened a little as she took in the blonde's appearance. Why wasn't she back to full health? "Cathy, are you still hurt? Do I need to heal you?"

Cathy held up one hand and backed away in mock fright. "Don't you dare! As long as I have my bruises, my bandages are safe from the corruption!"

"But-"

"Don't worry, I'm mostly joking. I simply wanted the healers to conserve their strength for serious injuries." She looked down at herself. "Though I'm not complaining about being able to wear something without parts flaking off."

"I'm not a fan of the mummy chic," Tiger commented.

Cathy glanced over at her and stopped when she spotted Lishika next to Ami. She raised an eyebrow.

"Lishika powered the electromagnets until she fell unconscious," Ami explained. "I'm restoring her reserves with my healing spell. You can talk freely, I'll notify you if she wakes up."

"I'll make sure to thank her later." Cathy selected the softest-looking armchair opposite from Ami and let herself drop into it. "Speaking of exhaustion, Snyder is excusing himself from this meeting. He wouldn't be able to contribute anything worthwhile to the debriefing anyway."

Ami did have questions for him, but they had answers she would need to ponder in peace anyway. "That's all right. But, um, do you know if the Avatar approved of what the dwarfs were doing? Killing everyone, I mean."

Cathy shrugged. "He didn't talk all that much before he attacked me." She paused. "Wait. He told me that I was too dangerous for him to hold back, so he'd have to heal me enough that I wouldn't die after he defeated me. I guess that means he wasn't entirely on board with plan 'exterminate'."

Ami perked up. "So the Light doesn't approve of that kind of behaviour?"

"You aren't supposed to hurt the helpless, no," the blonde confirmed. "I get the feeling he and the dwarfs don't see eye to eye-"

"Because they are too short?" Tiger interjected, earning herself a reproachful look from both Ami and the swordswoman.

"As I was saying," Cathy continued, "he broke their morale by throwing the fight and got them to prematurely deploy their hero gate by not telling them he was a fake. So there."

"Are you sure about all of that?" Ami asked. Faking a defeat wouldn't serve any purpose if he wanted the dwarfs to win. If he wanted them to break off their attack, however, it would work very well.

"No, it's perfectly normal to fall unconscious after being head-butted in the invisible shield protecting your face," the swordswoman muttered. She poked at the bandage around her forehead and grimaced a little. "So yeah, I'm pretty sure he was faking it."

"And him not being the real one?"

"Well, that's harder to say. He sounded and acted and fought like the real one, but didn't have the power to back it up. I'm pretty confident I could have beaten him eventually if I had started the battle uninjured."

"Let's hope we won't have to put that statement to the test," Tiger said.

"Well, is he going to come back? What's the situation like?" Cathy asked, leaning forward in her seat.

"The dwarfs are resting, same as our troops," Ami said. "They lost proportionally more soldiers than we did, but they still outnumber us."

"Who did we lose?" Cathy asked with a serious expression.

"I don't have precise numbers yet, but the majority of our permanent casualties were goblins," Ami answered, lowering her head as her thoughts went to the morgue. "I hoped you'd talk to your subordinate officers -" Ami hesitated, not having had the time to familiarise herself with them yet.

"Algot, Brom, and Kalres," Cathy supplied.

"Thank you, yes. Get the details from them later. And pass them on to me, please."

"Will do."

"The dragons are all fine, but most of the reaperbots need repairs, so we'd have to manage without those somehow if we were attacked right now. Oh, and your own armour is in bad shape, too."

Cathy snorted. "I can't imagine why."

"Damage to the dungeon isn't too bad," Ami continued. "We lost the outer perimeter tunnels, but those were designed to be expendable. I hope we'll be able to replace them before the dwarfs are ready to attack again. Right now, the imps are still busy fixing the bombardment holes in the core areas."

"Empress Mercury, may I come in?" a female voice sounded in Ami's head.

Ami gave her permission, and for a moment, the lights went out.

When they came back on, a cloaked figure wearing a hood was kneeling in front of Ami. "Your Majesty."

"At ease, Umbra," Ami said. "Have a seat while we wait for the others to arrive."

"Congrats on returning with all your limbs still attached this time!" Tiger teased as the other youma rose in a smooth motion.

The door opened at that point, drawing Ami's attention and making her miss Umbra's reply. Both Jadeite and Torian stepped in at the same time, with the result that they bumped into each other and got stuck in the doorway. They glared at each other, neither willing to let the other pass first. In the end, Jadeite used his superior strength to muscle his way past the warlock, who stumbled and hurried to rush in after the dark general.

Ami's eyes were mostly on Jadeite, who had recently re-summoned his uniform as it showed no sign of wear and tear yet.

"Your Majesty," he said with a confident grin as he bowed, one arm held over his chest.

"Jadeite," she returned the greeting. "Please have a seat."

Tiger poked her in the shoulder, drawing her attention. "Do you want me to move so he can sit here?" she asked with a wink.

Ami felt her face grow hot and gripped her collar nervously. "N-no, I-"

"At this point, an elbow to the ribs is the appropriate course of action," Cathy advised in a deadpan tone of voice.

"Congratulations to your inspiring victory, your Imperial Majesty!" Torian said as he bowed deeply. His fingers were gripping his staff so hard his knuckles showed brighter.

"Thank you," Ami answered, grateful for a reason to ignore Tiger. "Feel free to join the others." She gestured towards the seated people.

Torian smiled, showing his teeth, and immediately went for the armchair closest to her.

A group of two orcs and one troll in high-quality metal armour waited in front of the door. The troll was tall and narrow for someone of his species, and might not have fit through the doorway if he had been standing straight.

"Come in you three," Cathy called. "Empress, these are my sub-commanders Brom-"

One of the orcs, short but broad-shouldered and built like a barrel, saluted.

"- Algot- "

The tall troll saluted.

"- and Kalres."

The lone female of the trio had her white hair in a tight bun, which shook from the crispness of her salute.

"At ease," Ami told them. "Ah, and there are the final participants."

The dark elves Eline and Venna strode in through the door with steps so light Ami almost couldn't hear them. They turned towards her and stopped at a respectful distance. "Your Majesty," both of them said as they bowed simultaneously. What really drew Ami's attention was the black eye that Venna sported, contrasting sharply with her milk-white skin.

Had she been in a fight? She should have been safe deep inside the dungeon, looking after the civilians. Ami's gaze swept over the small crowd standing more or less tense before her. "Don't worry about protocol, this is an informal meeting," she told them. "Please, have a seat. To start with, does anyone know of urgent issues I need to be made aware of?"

The orcs and the troll exchanged glances, and then the widest member of the trio took a small, reluctant step forward.

Ami smiled at the orc. "Yes, Brom, was it?"

The pink-skinned creature nodded. "Uh, I'm not sure it's really urgent or if you don't know already, your Majesty," he said, fidgeting. "Bunch of the guys weren't happy with the restrictions they had to fight under and are talking about leaving. They say fighting with one hand tied is too dangerous. A dozen or so already took their gold and left."

Ami had been expecting something along those lines, but still found it alarming. With the dwarven numerical advantage, she couldn't really afford her own numbers to deplete much further. On the other hand, she didn't think that coercing her soldiers to stay and fight for her would result in a satisfying performance, even if she had been willing to do that.

Little beads of sweat formed on Brom's forehead as Ami pondered the problem in silence. "I obviously know they are wrong! They aren't thinking far enough ahead. All those prisoners we took will make us stronger once you torture them into joining us!"

Ami clenched her teeth, trying hard to keep her expression neutral. That was certainly not the plan. How would he react to learning that?

"Do any of you have suggestions for making sure we don't lose more troops in the short run?" Jadeite asked before she could think of a good reply.

"Um, Maybe, um, offer a bounty for each live prisoner brought in?" Brom asked, looking at Ami for guidance.

"Your Majesty, I must object!" Torian said, rising from his seat. "Such an incentive would simply lead to backstabbing as the brutes would try to claim the most bounties for themselves!"

"He has a point," Cathy agreed.

"Pool the bounties, split the pool evenly," Kalres suggested, her eyes darting from person to person.

"That might work," Ami said. In a way, having those of her underlings who didn't want to play by her rules leave was a good thing. "We'll replace those who left," she decided. "Jered is already contacting the local orc tribes, but we can step up recruitment efforts in the Underworld too."

She only had one portal, but there were other options.

"We can use the portals on the Avatar Islands, too. As long as people are merely passing through quickly, the corruption won't harm them too much." She looked Brom over more closely.

His equipment was in good shape, his hair was fairly clean for an orc, and he had shown some responsibility by bringing the unwelcome news of discontent to her attention.

"Can I entrust this recruitment mission to you?" Ami asked him with a short sideways glance at Cathy.

The blonde nodded once in approval.

"Yes, your Majesty!" Brom saluted and stood as straight as his bent stature would allow him. "The hirelings will want to see gold, though," he added after a moment. "And I'll need an escort to secure the way. And workers to raise the portal monoliths back into position."

"Granted." Ami remotely moved some gold from her treasury around and placed it in a locked room not far from the portal. She held up her hand, and a key appeared in front of Brom. "An imp will direct you to the room holding the required funds," she said.

The orc dropped on one knee as he snatched the key out of the air under the envious looks of his companions. "Thank you, my Empress."

Jadeite turned his head to stare at him, his eyes gleaming with a white light within. "Remember, responsibility for this mission lies with you. Do make sure to document your expenses, as I will be going over them later."

Brom paled, and his shoulders drooped. "O-of course."

Ami's smile turned a little strained. Her employees came from the Underworld, and assuming the worst of them was simply common sense. "Thank you, Jadeite." She turned to the crowd. "Is there anything else that went wrong?"

Venna raised her hand. "Well, I have some good news and some bad news," she said. "The bad news is that the civilians are getting unruly. For some unfathomable reason, they don't like the new fashions you devised. We had the beginnings of a riot on hands there," she said, raising a hand to her black eye.

"What did you do?" Ami asked, dreading the answer.

"Well, before we could do something, the lights flickered and the farms shut down and disgorged a huge swarm of insects," the dark elf said.

Ami raised her eyebrows. The farms' power failing during the battle was not unexpected, but their fading metabolism magic should not have resulted in accelerated insect growth. Oh, who was she kidding? She had a warm, damp dungeon and a corruption theme of fertility. An insect plague had probably been inevitable. She really needed to try and tweak those settings some more, and maybe give the dwarfs a hard time while she was at it.

"- buzzing and crawling everywhere, and then Eline got the bright idea of telling the civilians that the bugs were a warning from you, and that got them to back down, which is the good news," Venna chattered on. "Except now we have huge piles of bugs all over the place. Can't move a step without making crunching noises." She paused. "I guess that's bad news too?"

"Can we have them?" the troll officer - Algot - interrupted Ami's train of thought.

"Excuse me?"

"The bugs," the leathery-skinned being elaborated. "They'd go really well with chicken. Nice and crunchy. " He was salivating.

"You want to eat the bugs," Ami noted in a small voice. She glanced around the room and noted that neither Torian nor Eline or Venna looked surprised. Well, if the trolls wanted the insects, that would leave more of the real food for the rest. "Yes, sure, go right ahead. Anyone can take as many as they want."

"Thank you, your Majesty!"

Not that she thought that a little predation would solve the problem. The insects couldn't stay in the living quarters, but she had no immediate plan to get rid of them. Sure, she could convey her wishes to the primitive minds inside her dungeon - one by one. That wasn't going to help with a swarm. "Torian, do you know any spells to get rid of insect infestations?"

"Certainly. Fireball works wonders," the warlock commented dryly.

"However, getting them to move under their own power and without leaving bits all over the place is more the Vermin Lord's area of expertise. Perhaps your hostage abbot knows some applicable crop preservation spells, too."

Not a bad suggestion, Ami figured. "Anything else? Do you have a way to use sympathetic magic on one bug to affect the rest?"

"Despite our recent successes on the battlefield, I do not know of any spells that could be used to affect one living being through another," the warlock said, shaking his head. "Obviously, if you wanted me to research something along those lines, I could initiate a project to- "

"Your Majesty," Kalres interrupted, "as we are under siege, I would prefer it if any magical resources were directed towards the war effort. How much magical support can we troops expect in the field?"

"That is a question of finances, really," Ami answered, a little surprised by the orc taking charge.

In her Keeper sight, her rows of gem furnaces stood mostly inert, holding tiny, deformed sapphire growth. It looked as if the troubles with the electrical grid had not spared their current crop. It wasn't a total loss, as she would still get some gold from the partially grown sapphires, but the furnaces needed a good cleaning.

"When in doubt, I would rather spend gold on properly fortifying the dungeon rather than on spells," she elaborated. Optimally, she would be able to seal off her dungeon with steel walls, foiling further invasion attempts.

"I, too, would prefer not to attack before our forces are stronger," Kalres agreed readily.

"For now, any potential offensive operations against the dwarfs would be aimed only at crippling their ability to launch another invasion," Ami assured her. She turned her attention to her two magical specialists. "Jadeite and Torian, do you have anything to add? Could you apply the way you countered the dwarfs in an offensive manner?"

"Doubtful, your Majesty," Torian said, barely pre-empting Jadeite's answer. He shot the dark general a smug look. "We exploited a unique weakness that existed due to the dwarfs being in a rush. I would be incredibly surprised if they made the same mistake while constructing their home base."

"In that case, I want you to focus our research more on defensive applications," Ami instructed.

"Your wish is my command, my Empress."

Ami addressed the corner of the room blanketed in unnatural darkness. "Umbra, you have been to the dwarven camps. Have you seen or heard anything particularly noteworthy?"

"Between smashing siege equipment, wards, and them being able to see me in the dark, I was not able to do a lot of spying," Umbra said. "I overheard parts of a conversation about reinforcements and supplies arriving through the tunnels in the next few days."

"Tunnels? They must have been talking about one of their towns." Ami was certain that the dwarfs couldn't have dug a tunnel out to her location yet, even with their impressive digging speed. The dungeon was a few days walk away from their closest fortress. A pre-existing network perhaps? In any case, the presence of a hero gate above made reinforcements anywhere nearby something she couldn't afford to ignore. Reason enough to have a look. "Excuse me for a moment while I investigate." She transported a crystal ball from the library and had it float above her lap.

Tiger leaned over her shoulder, looking on with curiosity as the sphere lit up and showed the outside the of the dungeon.

Ami decided to pick the closest dwarven town for her scrying. Most of it was underground, but there were two impressive walls surrounding the buildings and the fortress on the surface. As she zoomed in on the dwellings nestled between the inner and outer wall, she couldn't help feel some admiration for the masonry. The individual blocks were put together so neatly that one would have had trouble to put even a knife's blade between the gaps.

As she got closer to the fortress, a bell engraved with a fern-like pattern started ringing by itself on top of the fortifications. Nearby, a short, grey-bearded guard dozing with his back against the crenellations jolted upright. He looked around wide-eyed, his head whipping left and right. His pale face turned towards the sky briefly, eyebrows furrowed. After a last glance back at the rune-covered bell, he sprinted into the nearest tower and slammed the door closed behind him.

After the initial moment of surprise that she had triggered some kind of spying alarm, Ami felt a little guilty as she watched the frightened inhabitants.

Dwarfs disappeared into buildings, jumped down hatches, and slammed down shutters. Within moments, the streets had cleared of all living things aside from some cats and dogs.

That wasn't what she had intended at all. While it was good to know that the dwarfs had working scrying detection, she would have much preferred observing them without disturbing them. Well, since it was too late for that now, she might as well follow through and keep the disruption of their lives down to this single time. She propelled her perspective down the main street, which lead straight to the mountainside and ended at a set of large double doors.

The physical obstacle was no barrier to Ami's crystal ball, and her point of view entered a large hall. At least she assumed that it was a large hall, since it was too dark to see much beyond a pair of large, square pillars. Movement overhead at a grate-covered window drew her attention just in time to see a shutter descend, rendering the place even darker. Some distance away, a dwarf-shaped silhouette placed a hood over another light, decreasing visibility even more.

Ami clenched her teeth as she realised that they were extinguishing all light sources. Unlike the dwarfs, she couldn't see in the dark.

"Well, that's a whole lot of blackness," Tiger commented, still leaning over Ami's shoulder.

Ami clenched her teeth and made her viewpoint hop from one fading light to the next, trying to stay ahead of the dwarfs as she chased the last vestiges of brightness.

A dropped torch got her further along the street, a patch of fluorescent fungus ahead a little deeper still. Then, a portcullis slammed down, cutting her off from all light. Still, the street had been straight and leading down at a constant angle so far.

Ami quickly rushed her point of view further in the same direction. For a few breathless seconds, she feared she had lost her opportunity, but then she saw the faintest hints of lights ahead.

Engravings that shone from within, already three-quarters hidden behind descending stone shutters, still provided enough illumination for her to confirm the presence of a large tunnel stretching off somewhere into the distance.

Wide-eyed, Ami stared at her crystal ball - or rather, at the parallel metal tracks visible on the tunnel floor within. "They have railways?"

Last edited: Aug 26, 2016

Dwarven Infrastructure

Originally on 2015-08-14T18:27:00

A large imp wearing a blue and black senshi uniform was lying on her belly under a thick bush. With three-fingered hands, she parted its wide-leafed branches so she could peer downhill at the dwarven town below, her eyes glowing purplish through her visor.Ami couldn't see much of the walls and the slate-tiled roofs from her current vantage point because high grass and a knobbly tree root obstructed her line of sigh. Fortunately, she was not here to spy on the surface structures. The dwarven railway - about whose existence she dearly hoped to be mistaken - would be underground. Having verified that there were no hunters or shepherds nearby who could stumble over her hiding spot by accident, she slowly crawled backwards, taking care not to rustle the leaves too much.

More and more of the town disappeared behind the hill's slope as she retreated from its steepest part. Finally, the flags on the highest towers sank beneath the horizon, leaving her surrounded by nothing but vegetation and the distant countryside.

Satisfied that she couldn't be spotted from below, Ami rose and headed for a rough-barked tree. She sat down against its trunk and wiped her fingers on the grass, carefully cleaning all the earth from her gloves before she reached into her backpack and retrieved a crystal ball.

On a branch above her, a magpie cawed and tilted its head to the side as it eyed the glittering sphere speculatively.

Ami shot the bird a suspicious look and clutched the scrying device on her lap tighter. It still had an important role to play in her plan, but that was for later. Her next step relied on a Keeper power she had only rarely found a use for up to now. She closed her eyes and focused on getting into the state of mind of a Keeper who wanted to place a new dungeon heart.

Immediately, the world erupted into loud, aggressive buzzing from every direction.

Ami jumped to her feet, hands raised to protect her face from the incoming onslaught of huge, stinging insects. It took her a moment to realise that the threatening noises had disappeared the instant she had lost her concentration. Feeling a little embarrassed, she sat back down and recovered her crystal ball.

The last time she had used that particular power, she had been in the dead wastelands of the Avatar Islands. Here, the environment was teeming with all kinds of life that produced a constant stream of background noises that she had been unprepared for.

She tried again, pushing her expanding awareness underground immediately.

The sound of insects receded, replaced by the groaning of wooden roots as trees swayed in the wind, the trickle of water making its way through worm tunnels, and the indistinct murmur of uncountable tiny digging creatures.

Ami briefly directed her attention to an ant colony that vibrated from the activity of thousands of legs, then to the scraping noises coming from a fox den she had spotted earlier. Both locations didn't feel hollowed-out to her Keeper sense, so perhaps it only indicated spaces large enough to fit at least an imp in? Curious, she shifted her focus even deeper, into the underground parts of the dwarven town.

The settlement expanded farther underground than it did above, and it was much louder than the natural noises that Ami had just encountered. Doors slammed like gunshots, thundering footsteps echoed through the halls, and a waterfall roared and hissed amidst a cacophony of clattering metal.

On second thought, Ami decided that the waterfall was only a boiling kettle. Her Keeper sense was definitely prioritising some kinds of sound over others, increasing the volume on liquid and impact noises while drowning out voices and music. At a guess, the former two would be more useful for finding caves and cracks within deep, quiet rock layers.

The amplified clang from a hammer striking metal was particularly loud, and the continued ringing of the anvil made it impossible to hear anything else in its vicinity.

Ami fled from the unpleasant noise, leaving the neighbourhood of the smithy by directing her attention to a quieter part of the town. By navigating away from the densest concentrations of footsteps, she eventually arrived at what she suspected to be its outskirts.

So far, listening to the ambient noises hadn't told her much about the town's internal organisation. The area was so saturated with sounds that she couldn't discern the tiny echoes that would tell individual rooms apart. With all those disturbances, it wasn't possible for her to discern where a train station would be.

This didn't discourage her at all. She directed her attention farther out to the northern side of the town, reasoning that the tracks she had seen in the crystal ball had led in that direction. Finding a long, hollowed-out space that extended beyond the town's borders should be feasible. Since she didn't know the exact depth of the tunnel, she would have to include an up-and-down zigzagging motion into her search pattern while she pushed her perception from the west to the east.

The faint noise of something rolling in the distance mixed with the muted background hum of the settlement intruded on her search.

A train or wagon? Her heart beating faster, Ami chased after the sound. She moved past a pair of squelching footsteps and crossed a grid of empty-sounding tunnels on her way. Was she passing through an abandoned part of the town? She heard water dripping into puddles, indicating a state of disrepair.

Ahead, the rolling noise picked up again, tinged with the ringing of metal. It continued for a few seconds until it stopped, replaced by the stomping of two heavy boots.

Ami memorised the location and let her perception return to normal as she looked at the crystal ball in her hands. Would she set off a scrying alarm if she tried to take a look? The problem wasn't the dwarfs extinguishing all lights. Darkness was not an effective counter against her scrying when she was nearby and knew where to remotely place some light spells.

Instead, she worried about the dwarfs mistaking her investigation as preparations for an invasion. She didn't want to provoke them into doing something rash, as the last thing she needed was another immediate assault on her dungeon.

Shuddering at the thought, she wondered if their scrying detection worked like her own. If it did, then the detector would need to visible in her crystal ball to be triggered. While that was almost inevitable when spying on a town from the sky, it should be an acceptably low risk when she was trying to see the inside of a tunnel outside the settlement. Prepared for the worst, she activated the orb.

The mirror-smooth surface changed from showing a distorted reflection of her imp-face to solid darkness, as was to be expected from an unlit location.

Proceeding according to her plan, Ami added a light spell to the spot she was scrying on, but the image in the orb did not change in any way.

Mildly disappointed that she hadn't hit her target on the first try, but unsurprised - locating something by sound wasn't especially precise - she adjusted her aim and tried again.

The scrying device stubbornly remained blank even after she peppered the area at random with another bunch of lights.

By now, she was getting a little nervous. Was a ward cancelling out her light spells? It would make sense to protect a train against hostile magic. To gain some distance from the potential obstacle, she moved the orb's point of view through the surrounding rock.

Something flashed violet within the crystal. A pre-existing light source?

Quickly, she backtracked to its location and found a muddy tunnel covered in in bulbous, violet mushrooms.

The light was coming from a young dwarf wearing glowing wristbands. It shifted with his every motion, bobbing up and down as he shovelled sticky muck from a wheelbarrow onto the artificial rock shelves on which the densely-packed fungi grew.

His wheelbarrow had a metal-clad wheel.

Ami hung her head. In her eagerness, she had followed a wheelbarrow to some kind of farm. At least, she comforted herself, he remained unaware of her scrying. She considered the pile of fertiliser inside the wheelbarrow.

Moist and dense-looking, it had to weigh a lot. It was unlikely that he had driven it out here all the way from the settlement.

Acting on impulse, she decided to backtrack his path. At worst, she would spend a few minutes to find nothing but a large pile of manure nearby, and it wasn't as if she had any better leads yet.

Even with only the dim light coming from his wristbands, his tracks were clearly visible. The wheel had left a shallow groove on the mud-stained ground, clearly visible until it disappeared into the darkness behind a bend.

Ami projected a weak light spell, no brighter than a candle, into the shadows. To her relief, it appeared with no issues, proving that the previous failures were simply due to her casting the spells into solid rock. Continuing down the tunnel, she idly wondered if the mushrooms lining its walls were edible for humans. Food variety in her dungeon could be better, and those fungi wouldn't even need light to grow inside her farm rooms.

She found a large heap of fertiliser at the end of the tunnel, underneath some dirt stains running vertically up the wall. Following them, she spotted a dirty mine cart on a ledge above, standing on train tracks.

Upon seeing the vehicle, she would have loved to jump to the comforting conclusion that she had simply mistaken mining infrastructure for a railway. However, if the dwarfs were already applying mining technology to agriculture, then they could also be using it for transport and travel in general. The main limiting factor, in that case, would be propulsion.

Moving her vantage point closer to the squat, square cart, she noticed another alarming detail. A hook was protruding from the iron vehicle's front, clearly designed for attaching it to another.

While the cart did have handles for manually pulling or pushing it, it also looked very heavy. She didn't think she would be able to pull more than a single full cart unless she was transformed. So far, she hadn't seen any of the dwarfs perform feats of superhuman strength, and a cursory inspection of the tracks revealed no evidence of draft animals either.

How would they move a chain of carts? For her own safety, she needed to investigate further.

After moving her point of view along the rails for a while, she spotted a light source in the distance. Wary about raising alarms, she inched her field of view towards the edge of the illuminated cave. Still working on the principle that a scrying detector would not spot her unless she established line of sight with it, she moved as if she was sneaking around physically. Thus, she remained focused on the ground until she spotted shadows indicating that she was next to a pile of crates. Shifting her viewing angle, she examined the wooden boxes.

They were filled with mushrooms from the farm, their stems cut cleanly near the bottom with a sharp tool.

Ami would have expected the ones at the bottom of the pile to be squished into a messy paste from the weight, but apparently, they had a texture more akin to raw potatoes than to the softer fungi she was used to.

One of the uppermost crates suddenly rose into the air, leaving a gap in the stack that showed her much more of the cave than she had originally planned.

She froze, waiting for an alarm to go off, but when nothing happened, she zoomed out further to see the entire place.

With a single glance, she could see that it was some kind of loading and unloading area for agricultural products. Next to the nearby stack of filled boxes, more mushrooms lay on spread out cloths and waited to be packed. Empty wheelbarrows stood near a closed door, and the gravity-challenged crate that had surprised her was in fact dangling from a small crane.

She turned her attention to the complicated-looking wooden contraption. Equipped with pulleys and a swivelling arm, it looked as if it could reach every spot of the circular chamber. Gears and axles turned inside as a red faced-dwarf cranked a winch, sweat running down his brow.

The crane's operator had a seat higher on the apparatus and was yanking levers to manoeuvre its cargo towards a chain of connected mine carts.

Ami felt the muscles of her imp face twitch and noticed she was glaring at the train, frustrated by its mere existence. The question foremost in her mind now was how much of a threat it posed to her. Determined to find out how it worked, she directed her attention to the larger, roofed wagon at its front end.

She was hesitant to call it an engine, since, as far as she could tell, the wedge-tipped vehicle had no propulsion aside from a set of seats with pedals. It was as muscle-powered as the crane. While she considered that reassuring, it didn't necessarily mean she was safe.

Her attention briefly turned towards the cave's light source. There were small alcoves where normally would have been torches affixed to the wall, each holding a statuette of a squat, armoured figure. Every stone carving carried on its head a glass disc that shone like a miniature sun. Those lamps were a good reminder that the dwarfs were fond of creating enchanted objects and that she shouldn't let a first impression deceive her.

She made her view circle the train, considering it within its surroundings. She could easily deduce that it had been parked at the top of a ramp so it could be pushed down and gain speed when it left the station fully-loaded. Obviously, it had arrived on one prong of the horseshoe-shaped track, been unloaded, pulled up the ramp, and now waited to be filled with the harvest.

Nothing so far indicated that it was able to move under its own power.

Ami glanced at the lavish illumination again. If the dwarfs had enough mana for something like that, then they could certainly enhance a few carts if they wanted to. She examined the underside of the engine and found a number of runes that she didn't recognise. With the aid of her fabrication spell, she copied them onto a sheet of paper so she could show them her warlocks later.

With the paper safely stashed away inside her backpack, she made another pass around the engine. It had a number of evenly-spaced indentations along both of its sides where the metal looked worn, but their exact purpose remained unclear to her. All things considered, the engine looked less advanced than she had feared, but that didn't necessarily mean that it was slow, at least over short distances. Besides, simple things could be more easily replaced than complicated ones.

She tapped her finger against the crystal ball, thinking about what the verified existence of enemy trains meant. If she assumed that they were only muscle-powered and moved with the speed of a bike, they were still much faster than a soldier on foot. Just as importantly, they could travel through the mountains on a path that ignored the intervening terrain. When she considered them from that point of view, then the technical specifications of the engines were secondary to the extent of the network and the number of trains that existed.

Which meant that she needed to figure out just how connected the dwarven settlements really were.

With a puff of smoke, Ami appeared inside the empty tunnel she had chosen as her destination. It counted as claimed territory, so she couldn't simply transport an imp inside, but that was why she was possessing one who had learned how to teleport herself. Arriving in mid-air and upside-down hadn't been part of the plan.

Quickly, she tucked in her legs to increase her spinning speed. Despite the glowing smoke cloud from her arrival interfering with her visor's night vision, she managed to hit the ground feet-first, if at an awkward angle. She waved her arms to keep her balance, took a few rapid steps forward, and tripped over one of the metal rails.

Her imp arms were just a little too short to reach the wall and steady herself.

On the ground, uninjured but annoyed, she decided that imp teleportation had to be the result of malicious design on the part of the dark gods. Why else would a short-legged creature who typically carried a heavy backpack need to perform a somersault in order to activate a magical ability?

It was almost enough of an inconvenience to make her reconsider her other scouting option, but only almost. She would have to scry on a spot, cast a light spell, move her scrying target to the edge of the light radius, cast a new light, and repeat the previous steps. Over a distance of many kilometres. Not only would it be a tedious process, it would also take more time than simply teleporting around.

Besides, being physically present let her investigate the system in more detail than watching it through a crystal ball. She could start with the wall she had almost smashed her head into.

She placed her fingers against the rock, barely finding purchase on the smoothly-hewn stone as she pushed herself to her feet. Her gaze moved upwards, following the wall as it curved to form a graceful arc above the two parallel-running railway tracks.

This tunnel was larger than the ones from the farming station, and its shape was so regular that she wouldn't have been surprised to learn that it had been made by a large digging machine. In her mind, she pictured something like a battering ram, with a huge drill at the front that ate its way through the underground like a dwarven pickaxe.

Speculation aside, the rails merited additional attention. Contrary to her expectations, they weren't made from metal, or even assembled from pieces larger than her current body. Each rail consisted of individual pieces of carved stone, slotted next to each other like a very low and narrow brick wall. They stood so close together that they would have been hard to recognise as separate if it wasn't for discontinuities in colouration.

In her opinion, stone, even if it was plentiful - the pieces for the rails had obviously been carved from the surrounding rock - was too brittle and prone to splintering for what it was being used here. She squatted down to have a closer look, fully expecting to find abrasions, cracks, and other signs of wear.

While the rounded, topmost part of the rail had been worn so smooth it gleamed, she didn't discover any structural damage with her superficial inspection. She raised her hand, searched for a moment before she found the earring on the imp's unfamiliar head shape, and adjusted her visor's vision mode.

On the display, the stone gained a faint aura that indicated a weak magical charge, concentrated more within the lower parts that were hidden underground. If Ami was interpreting the numbers correctly, then the enhancements were meant to reinforce the rail against the effects of weight and pressure.

Ami looked up and down the tunnel, following the faintly-glowing lines of the rails that faded into the distance in both directions. Not for the first time, she wondered how the dwarfs were able to support all this without a dungeon heart.

Well, she wouldn't get answers by standing here, and she still needed to find out where this railway led. Since the town closest to her dungeon was to the south, she turned towards the north and looked at the farthest parts of the tracks she could still see. With a soft sigh, she ran a few steps to gain enough speed for a somersault.

Last edited: Aug 26, 2016

Hidden Mechanisms

Originally on 2015-08-28T22:33:00

After using imp teleportation a few more times, Ami had adapted to arriving mid-somersault. She landed on the tracks with only a minor stumble, straightened, and prepared for her next hop farther down the tunnel.

Something moved farther ahead, catching her attention and making her hesitate.

The monochromatic display of her visor showed her the back of a train. A few helpful annotations around it told her that it wasn't going very fast, moving at around twenty-one point seventy-two kilometres per hour and decelerating.

She didn't want to be spotted, so this was a bit of a problem. If she teleported ahead of the train, then the passengers would definitely notice the green flash. They might not be able to identify her in the darkness, but they would know that something strange was going on. Gathering information would be much harder when everyone was on high alert, and she really hoped she would be able to find a map of the railway network somewhere.

Perhaps she had been lucky. The train was slowing down, so it might be nearing a station. If it hadn't warned her, she might have teleported somewhere where people could see her. In any case, a train in motion was a perfect opportunity for finding out if there was something more to its engine than just muscle power.

Given teleportation's highly-visible side effects, she couldn't just appear next to the train, but she had other options. With a short leap, she moved to the free area between the two parallel tracks and broke into a run. She was possessing an imp body enhanced with senshi enchantments, and the little creature knew a speed-boosting spell on top of it. Unless the train suddenly accelerated, she would catch up in no time.

The vehicle made life easier for her by continuing to decelerate until it was moving at a crawl.

She hoped that nobody on the train would look backwards while she approached. While she was tiny at the moment, her red-glowing eyes could still give her away in the darkness. After briefly considering sunglasses fit for an imp, she regretfully came to the conclusion that they would interfere with her visor's night vision - in addition to looking ridiculous. For now, she simply hoped that any dwarfs who turned to face her would not see enough, their eyes still used to looking at the part of the tunnel illuminated by the engine's head lights.

Ahead, said tunnel split into two branches, one for each track.

Ami briefly wondered why they stayed parallel instead of one of them veering off and leading elsewhere. As she inspected the walls, she noticed a brighter gap ahead and slowed her step.

On the floor, a matching brighter rectangle confirmed that light was shining from a doorway.

She stopped and ducked, unwilling to approach the train while it was pulling into the suspected station.

The train came to a stop with a screeching noise and six dwarfs jumped out of the engine. Most of them positioned themselves next to the carts, but one walked towards the doorway. He was carrying something that looked like a long, thin plank with regularly-spaced marks.

A local dwarf emerged from the opening and shook hands with him. The two conversed with each other for a while, their gestures calm and relaxed. The conductor's shoulders shook, perhaps from laughing, and he pointed at one of the wagons.

With eager steps, the local walked over to it, lifted its tarp, and bent over the cart. Some rummaging later, his hand emerged holding a large bottle in his hand. He returned to the other dwarf with a bounce in his step and slapped his shoulder. Taking the proffered ruler-like object along with the bottle, he disappeared back through the doorway.

Meanwhile, the other dwarfs were gripping the carts by their side handles and leaned against them with all of their might to push the train forward centimetre by centimetre.

Ami wondered what they were doing. From her vantage point, she could only see that the tunnel - both branches, actually - narrowed so much that there was barely any space between the sides of the engine and the walls. The remaining carts were narrower, but even for them it was a close fit.

The workers stopped pushing when the front part of the engine had disappeared into the narrowed section of the tunnel so far that only the door in the back still poked out. All of them turned to face the doorway, clearly waiting for something.

With the train standing still, Ami could hear clicking noises coming from ahead, along with the voices of the dwarfs. She also heard another strange sound and went completely still, holding her breath so she could listen better.

It was a high-pitched whirring noise that reminded her of a hungry gnat, or perhaps a dentist's drill. In any case, it was not a noise that she had ever associated with railway operation.

Finally, the local dwarf re-emerged from the doorway and returned the flat object to the conductor, nodding.

The others reacted immediately, rushed back to the engine's door and climbed back in with hurried motions.

The door had barely slammed shut when a horn echoed through the tunnel. It sounded again, and then a horrible metallic screeching noises startled Ami.

Blinking, she stared at the back of the train. Without her visor giving her the numbers, she wouldn't have noticed that it was moving again, very slowly.

Again, the screech of stressed metal assaulted her ears, and the train accelerated with a jerk that must have been unpleasant for its passengers. It was now twice as fast as before.

Ami covered her ears as the noise repeated again and again, with each interval a little shorter than the previous one. With every repetition, the train gained more speed, an almost linear increase with each jerk. When the noises finally stopped, she stared at the final reading with a sinking feeling.

The train had left the station at a speed of almost ninety kilometres per hour.

Ami re-evaluated the railway's threat level. With that kind of periodic boost, the enemy could have soldiers from all over their nation on her doorstep within days. She needed to do something about this.

With the risks of inaction now outweighing those of discovery, she tiptoed closer to the station, eager to learn how the boost worked. The whirring got louder with every step, putting her more on edge, but she tried to look on the bright side. At least it masked the sounds of her approach.

She arrived near the doorway without difficulties and pressed herself against the wall. Quietly muttering her fabrication spell, she created a tiny mirror with a long, stick-like handle. Extending it close to the floor like a periscope, she managed to peer past the door frame.

Her caution was well worth it because her mirror showed her boots facing the door.

Angling her spying tool a little higher, she saw that the owner of said feet was sitting at a massive desk made from dark wood.

She recognized the dwarf who had come out earlier to meet the conductor. He was currently writing into a thick ledger, using a feather similar to the one sticking out of his felt hat.

Ami didn't know how he managed to concentrate with the constant whirring in the background, but perhaps the contents of the large stone mug next to him helped him stay calm. Personally, she would only grew more nervous if she was in his place. She would be worrying the entire time about spilling something on the expensive-looking piece of furniture. While she would have loved to admire its intricately-carved geometrical patterns in greater detail, she had other priorities.

With the way the dwarf was sitting, it would be impossible to get into his office without being noticed.

She briefly considered rushing past the doorway when he lowered his eyes to investigate the narrowed section of the tunnel first, but then she had a better idea. Her gaze rose to the ceiling, confirming that there was enough space between it and the top of the doorway. She jumped, her senshi enhancements allowing the imp body to leap clear over the opening.

The moment she was past the doorway, she darted forwards, hiding in the darkness just in case the whirring noise hadn't masked the noise of her landing completely. She glanced back several times as she approached the narrowed part of the tunnel, but nobody arrived to search for her.

Inside the narrow section, the noise was even louder than outside, and the walls were completely straight and vertical. Their defining features were the horizontal slits located at the height of Ami's head, placed in pairs that faced each other. Parts of steel cogwheels poked out, the edges of their teeth scraped blank by wear and tear.

They weren't moving right now, but she could see that they were about the right size to match up with the strange indentations in the sides of the engine she had observed back at the mushroom-packing station. If the cogwheels gripped the engine properly and had enough raw strength behind them, they could conceivably accelerate a vehicle.

She looked farther down the tunnel, spotting more pairs of cogwheels facing each other. That confirmed her hypothesis. The system would have to be calibrated precisely, and any inaccuracies would result in unpleasant jerks for the passengers, but it could work.

Her visor informed her about a heat source behind one of the walls, on the same side as the doorway. Intrigued, she wondered about what kind of power source the dwarfs were using. She placed one ear against the rock to listen in more closely, and managed to make out a rattling noise despite the whirring. The stone against her skin vibrated, as if shaken by a sound much deeper than the loud whirring.

As much as she liked solving riddles, she just didn't have the time to figure out what was going on the hard way. Quietly, she crossed her arms and cast Shabon Spray, surrounding her current location with obscuring mist.

The inside of the magical fog cloud swallowed a flash of green, then another a few seconds later.

Ami had returned from her brief trip back to her dungeon holding a rat, which was wriggling excitedly in her grip. She stroked the animal's head with a finger to calm it down - it hadn't appreciated the somersault any more than she did - and placed it on the ground.

A moment of concentration later, a trail of black lightning connected her with the rodent, and the red light in the imp's eyes died down.

The world appeared to grow much larger around Ami as she took possession of the rat's senses.

Mentally, she ordered the imp to stay put and moved her new body towards the doorway. As a rat, even if noticed, she wouldn't be much cause for alarm. She jumped up the two stairs looming before her and hurried through the entrance, hoping that the dwarf didn't have a pet cat.

Her first proper glimpse of the room's interior surprised her with the quality of its interior decoration, which seemed fit more for a mansion than for a random train station's office. Even the floor tiles were so smooth that her claws found little purchase, and she skidded almost all the way underneath the desk before she managed to brake.

It wasn't a bad observation spot as long as she made sure she didn't get kicked. The dwarf above certainly wouldn't be able to see her through the thick wooden surface.

With great interest, she analysed the various charts and diagrams carved directly into the shiny wood panelling. As far as she could tell, many of them were tables meant to associate weight and wagon types with various line patterns similar to the one the conductor had brought earlier.

Next to the references were two glass tubes connected to the floor that reminded her of huge thermometers, complete with scale and liquid inside. According to the numbers next to them, they measured weight, rather than temperature.

To Ami, it was clear that they had to be involved in measuring the weight of the trains waiting in the tunnels outside. While she hadn't noticed any mechanism for it, she hadn't been paying particular attention to the ground. Nevertheless, everything she was seeing in the room so far confirmed what she had already suspected. Accelerating the trains required precise, individualised calculations and adjustments. Since she didn't see any controls here, they had to be past the door in the north wall, closer to the source of the noise.

She slowly approached said obstacle, staying close to the wall behind the dwarf's back. The door looked just as sturdy and well-crafted as the rest of the room's furniture, and there was barely any gap underneath it. There was also a complete lack of convenient rat-sized gaps or holes. She would have to risk opening the door.

Guided by rodent instincts, she climbed up the vertical surface, using its engravings as footholds. A valiant leap, and she was hanging off the handle with her forelegs, in immediate danger of sliding off the smooth metal. Kicking her hind legs, she managed to touch the door and awkwardly pushed herself upwards. When she was finally sitting on the handle, she treated her current body like an underling and moved it downwards with her Keeper telekinesis. The pressure was unpleasant, but the handle tilted downwards before the push could become painful.

At once, a gust of warm air blew the door open and scattered the documents on the desk, prompting a startled curse from the dwarf as he jumped to his feet.

Ami was flung off the handle when the door slammed against the wall, and she dropped to the floor. Disoriented, she heard the dwarf stomp closer. At least she had landed between the door and the wall where he couldn't see her.

"Lorga! What do you think you are doing?" the dwarf yelled as he walked past her.

"What?" a young-sounding voice shouted back, barely audible over the whirring.

Ami darted out of her hiding spot when the door started closing. The dwarf was pulling it shut as he passed through, and she dashed forward to slip in before it was too late.

The door slammed shut with a loud bang and only missed taking off the tip of her tail by a hair's width.

"Lorga! Take off the damn earplugs when I'm talking to you!"

A female dwarf who looked only slightly older than Ami was sitting on a stool amidst a thicket of levers. Large blue eyes blinked in the direction of the doorway as she tugged something that looked like a fluffy headset off her head. "What is it, old man? Did you forget something?"

"I want to know what you were doing at the door instead of concentrating on your job, you useless apprentice!"

Lorga glanced over at a complicated assembly of cogwheels and spinning axles, most of which disappeared into the ceiling.

"Have you been drinking the special brew again? I haven't moved from this spot at all!"

While the two argued, Ami was inspecting the mechanism. Most of it seemed to be dedicated to switching out cogwheels of different sizes in order to adjust their rotation speeds.

"Don't play dumb! Am I supposed to believe that the door opened all by itself?"

"But I really didn't- ow!"

Lorga rubbed her head where the older dwarf had smacked her with his knuckle and glared at him, a pout on her freckled face.

"Don't lie to me! Do you see anyone else who could have done it?"

Ami felt bad for getting the innocent apprentice into trouble, but most of her attention was captivated by what had to be the power source she had been looking for.

A enormous flywheel made of stone was spinning like a top on the far side of the hall.

She gaped at the device's dimensions. It was wider than her dungeon heart and had to weigh several tons. How was it spinning without losing most of its energy to friction, falling apart, or at least destroying the floor underneath it?

Her gaze wandered down the axle, which was equipped with cogwheels of various diameters. Against all logic, its bottom part was hair-thin. Only the light-blue gleam of the needle-like tip gave away how it managed not to collapse under the weight resting on it. An indestructible material like adamantine opened up some unusual engineering options.

The tip spun on top a small plate of adamantine, explaining how it wasn't drilling its way into the ground. The contact point between both pieces of the holy metal glowed hot from the friction and produced the loud whirring she was hearing.

The power source was actually more of a power storage device, she corrected herself. If she understood the system correctly, then Lorga's task was picking the correct combination of cogwheels for matching the speed of the rotating axles protruding from the ceiling to that of the flywheel. That way, she would be able to gradually spin it up faster and faster so that enough power to accelerate trains was stored.

"...told you it wasn't me!" Lorga was still arguing. Her eyes suddenly went wide, and she paled. "M-maybe there's an invisible monster in here with us?"

The older dwarf swept his gaze over the room, frowning.

Ami didn't like where their conversation was going and hid behind a lever. Mentally, she ordered the imp to enter the other room and have a look at the paperwork. Through the underling's eyes, she searched for hints of a map.

The records listed arrival times, departure times, weights, cargo, service fees, as well as other technical details that weren't useful to her. No map anywhere, but there had been more passenger trains than usual going north during the last few days.

"I don't sense any bones anywhere," the master of the station said after a moment, but he didn't sound entirely convinced.

"G-ghosts don't have b-b-bones," Lorga pointed out, shivering.

Ami couldn't in good conscience scare the girl more by opening the door again, especially when she had a much more efficient way to leave. She ordered the imp to move back into the tunnel and possessed it, her shadowy form passing through the wall without resistance. She didn't even have to leave the poor rat behind. Her head counted as a large enough piece of claimed territory that she could snatch it from the room with Keeper transport and drop it there.

For her trouble, she gained a few scratches as the animal launched itself off the back of her skull and fled into the tunnel, away from the noise.

She didn't interfere as it escaped, figuring that it had earned its freedom. Also, she didn't have a comfortable way to carry it when she teleported again.

Her thoughts returned to the flywheel. She still didn't know exactly what the dwarfs were using to feed it, but that had ceased to be important. Theoretically, anything that provided a more or less constant rotation would do. Windmills, draft animals, or even cranks could all work as long as there was enough time between trains. If she had to interfere with the railway network, then the mechanisms in the stations would take far more time to replace.

Ami had travelled inside the tunnel for a few more teleports when it came to an end. A large cave opened before her, its stalactites and stalagmites covered in odd blackish moss. Water ran down the walls in small rivulets, pooling at its bottom. The tracks continued on a wide, sturdy bridge that led over the quiet lake. Marble pillars and winged statues flanked them on both sides before they disappeared behind a huge gate set into the back wall of the cavern.

Just looking at the double doors with their intricate silver and golden sunburst designs made Ami want to run and hide. She was suddenly very glad she hadn't tried to stow away on a train. Entering a temple of the Light wouldn't end well for her, even if she wasn't in her own body at the time.

Keeping her eyes on the ground, she didn't even need to wonder why the dwarfs would run a railway line through a temple. After all, it was already proving effective at keeping her out, and she assumed it would also deal with spies, diseases, and other unwelcome surprises. It was clear that she wouldn't be able to continue through that route.

However, she wouldn't give up that easily. She had an imp body and a pick, and if necessary, she could dig a path around the obstacle. First, however, she needed to find out if such drastic measures were even worthwhile. Wanting to know where exactly she was, she made another somersault and disappeared in a flash of green motes.

She reappeared in bright sunshine, high up in the cool air. Before gravity could accelerate her too much, she transported herself on top of an unclaimed hill, where dense vegetation softened her landing and helped hide her from view.

Well-hidden, it didn't take her long to figure out that she had arrived at another dwarven city. She zoomed in with her visor, taking in the above-ground structures.

There were many more dwarfs than she had expected. Weapons and armour gleamed on every plaza, and she could see tents around the city wall.

Her hackles rose when she realised that there were too many soldiers for a single city. With her visor's magnification, she could see that the militiamen training in the city were wearing insignia from at least eight different nobles. This army had been gathered from all over the region.

Quickly, she did some simple maths in her head. The army besieging her dungeon had around three-thousand soldiers serving three different nobles. Assuming that each noble here could call upon the same number of troops, then there were about eight thousand enemies here preparing to attack her.

Her breath went faster and faster when she compared potential travel times to her projected wealth growth and concluded with certainty that her defences would not be ready in time. If she remained passive, then she would be crushed.

Last edited: Aug 26, 2016

Urgent Decisions

Originally on 2015-09-26T03:39:00

"...and that's the current situation," Ami finished, pointing at the large map that was hanging on the wall as if it was a blackboard. Her own dungeon was marked with a blue flag that had the Mercury symbol on it, while a thick red line indicated the railway connection between the two dwarven settlements.

Cathy let herself sink against the back of her chair heavily. "Another eight-thousand men already gathered," she said, a hint of disbelief in her voice. "How are we supposed to deal with that?"

"We'll have to go on the offensive and stop or delay the dwarven reinforcements," Ami said hoping that her advisers would be able to contribute some useful ideas. She looked at the faces around the table one by one.

At the leftmost place, Snyder looked as if only shock at the revelation of the latest danger was keeping him awake. He had dark circles under his wide-open eyes and was resting his head on his hands. Wrapped in a white toga, he almost looked as if he had brought a blanket.

To his right, Cathy frowned and raised her hand to her chin, only to wince as she touched one of her bandages.

"Obviously, we need to destroy the railway," Jadeite stated matter-of-factly. He was sitting in the centre, looking serious but confident - and also somewhat distracting since his conjured uniform was suffering from corruption damage.

Ami reluctantly tore her gaze away from his chest, which wasn't adequately covered by his crossed arms. "At least the acceleration stations need to go," Ami agreed. "Disabling them will give the best effect, even more so than damaging the tunnels. The enemy has enough troops to split up into different groups. One could march on while a second digs a bypass and a third fixes the cave-in. In contrast, the stations have complicated machinery that is harder to replace. Without them, the dwarfs should take around three to four times longer to arrive here", she lectured.

Her adopted sister seemed to be only half listening and was scribbling numbers on a piece of paper. She stopped, underlined something, snorted in irritation and balled up the paper. With a careless gesture, she brushed it aside.

It landed in front of Jadeite, who was sitting next to her. The dark general shot her an irritated look. He had been glowering occasionally at the youma ever since she had managed to talk him into creating a model train with glamour. The toy was currently racing around a circular track on the table.

Ami wasn't entirely sure if he was unhappy because he found the task beneath his dignity or because she had complimented Tiger on the idea. It had saved valuable time explaining to the locals what exactly a train was.

Torian, sitting on the rightmost side of the group, leaned forward to see what Tiger was writing. Or perhaps he was trying to get a good look down her neckline, as she was still wearing what was left of her corruption-damaged senshi uniform. Even though she had tied the remaining pieces together with bands of fabric, the result resembled a daring swimsuit more than it did the original uniform.

While Ami didn't approve of the outfit, she was a little relieved that it drew attention away from her own. Whenever she had to brush aside her cloak to use her hands, she worried that the corruption had altered her shorts and shirt while nobody was looking. Why couldn't it go bother the dwarfs outside instead? Maybe she should work on that once she had some time to spare.

Her chief warlock distracted her from her discomfort. He had been quiet during her explanation; listening intently while following the model train with his eyes. After a glance at the map he said "Forgive me, your Majesty, but I'm not sure I understand every aspect of the problem. These 'trains' don't appear to be difficult to handle. Surely, they can be easily stopped?"

His fingers emerged from underneath his own vampire-like cloak, wriggling in the air. Sparks danced around a section of the track, and with a loud snap, it broke. The rails bent upwards, forming a small ramp.

The engine went over it, leapt off the tracks and right over the edge of the table. It hit the ground, and the impact smashed the wagons open, scattering tiny dwarf figures across the tiles.

It was all too easy for Ami to imagine the still figures as real corpses staring up lifelessly at the ceiling. Just like the ones in her morgue, she thought, feeling a stab of guilt. Derailing occupied trains was one of the things she wasn't prepared to do. "Stopping a few trains won't help. The real danger is logistics," she said.

"I see." Torian didn't sound entirely convinced.

"This can't be the only railway line," she elaborated. "It would make sense for every major town in the country to be connected, which means that it's possible to travel from one end to the other in only a few days." Reaching for an analogy he would be familiar with, she added "Think of it as slow Keeper transport for armies on a national scale."

Torian paled, the contrast between his skin and his black beard slowly growing more pronounced. "But, your Majesty, I vaguely remember reading somewhere that Nimbadnur has six duchies!"

"Don't forget that there's a king too," Cathy added, causing the warlock to wince.

His voice started wavering a little when he continued "Your Majesty, you will be able to tear down this railway network, right?"

Ami grimaced. "The tunnels are dark, so I would have to personally locate each of them. Even if I found them, I'd have to make them unusable over a large distance to prevent the dwarfs from simply going around the damage."

"Damnation! Is there nothing we can do?" Torian asked.

"Calm down, we won't have the entirety of the kingdom's army on our doorstep tomorrow," Cathy said.

The warlock turned to look at her with wide, hopeful eyes. It was an expression that didn't belong his haughty features.

Ami paid close attention to the swordswoman too, wondering where her optimism came from.

"Unlike Keepers, kingdoms don't have all of their soldiers as a standing army," the blonde explained. "Most of their forces are militia, which need to be trained, equipped, and, most importantly, collected from the villages and hamlets spread across their liege lord's territory. Those warriors won't be able to just take a train to the gathering point."

"That's great," Ami said with a genuine smile.

Guided by her telekinesis, a piece of chalk drew a skewed circle on the map, centred on her dungeon's location. The chalk made a few more passes, adding arrows directed towards the circle from the surrounding regions.

Ami pointed at the drawn ring. "In addition, I'm reasonably certain that no tracks get closer to the dungeon than this." She was extrapolating from the lack of sufficiently large towns nearby. "From there, the enemy soldiers would need to march here on foot."

"So we'll at least see them coming," Tiger commented before resuming her scribbling.

Curious, Ami glanced at the sheet, which was filled with stroked-out lines and revisions. Maths didn't seem to come easily to her adopted sister, even if she obviously knew what she was doing. "Tiger, what exactly are you working on?" Ami addressed the black-striped youma.

"Just trying to figure out how much gold we'd need to steal in order to build enough fortifications before the dwarfs are here," Tiger said, frowning at her number-covered sheet of paper.

"And?"

"I'm not sure yet, but it looks as if it's going to work if we get the gold early enough to skip the first cycles of harvesting gems and building more furnaces."

That matched Ami's own thoughts on the issue. Due to the nature of exponential growth, any boost at the beginning would give much greater returns than a boost at a later point.

"Well," Torian said with a wide grin, "by most accounts, dwarven towns are filthy rich."

Ami didn't think the dwarfs would forgive her for stealing from them, even if she paid everything back with interest later. Much of their wealth would be in the form of art and cultural treasures, which she wouldn't be able to replace. Ignoring the moral issues, there was also a big practical problem with Torian's suggestion. "The wealth wouldn't be all conveniently in one place, just waiting for me to snatch it. I'd have to conquer and search the place."

Her chief warlock nodded, his face falling.

"Could you rob some Keeper's treasury?" Cathy suggested.

Ami perked up. "I could visit Morrigan's dungeon again."

"Your trap already went off and his minions looted everything valuable when the dungeon heart blew up," Snyder said in a tired voice. "Or so Monteraine told me. She seemed rather exuberant about his misfortune."

"Darn it. I mean, it's good, but inconvenient." Ami lowered her head. "Unfortunately, I don't know about any other enemy dungeon locations." Maybe she could ask the Avatar? In any case, getting the gold from other Keepers wouldn't be simple. Having to deal with their retaliation in addition to fending off the dwarfs would be suboptimal, too. "In fact, I don't know of any other feasible targets." She paused. "I could try mining for gold or gems instead. Do any of you know of a good location by chance?"

The locals shook their heads.

Ami sighed. It had been a long shot. "Jadeite, please have some of the smarter employees look for natural resources," she decided, even though she didn't have high hopes for success. Anyway, setting up a proper mining operation would require time, resources, and quite possibly a new dungeon heart, and she didn't want to stretch herself too thin.

The dark general nodded. "As you wish. Does that include the youma?"

Ami considered for a moment before shaking her head. "No, I think they will be more useful for tactical operations than for information gathering. Some of Jered's hirelings should be suitable for the task."

While she hadn't paid attention to every creature that had entered her dungeon, it had been impossible to miss all of the humans with dubious backgrounds he had recruited. This would be a good test to see if his plan to turn them into a spy network was feasible.

At the mention of Jered's name, Cathy shifted and let out a wistful sigh.

Ami met the swordswoman's eyes. "Oh, I'm planning to bring Jered back here soon," she said. "Don't worry; the orcs are treating him as their honoured guest."

"I'm starting to wonder if he wouldn't be safer with them than here," Cathy quipped, but her face lit up with anticipation.

"Which brings us right back to needing a plan for stopping the soldiers that have already gathered," Ami returned to the most urgent topic. "Perhaps we could negotiate a cease-fire by using our prisoners as leverage?"

"No competent commander would save a few expendable soldiers if he could outright win the war instead," Jadeite said, dashing her hopes. "They are worthless as hostages."

Ami didn't want to believe that her opponents would be that callous. "But-"

The dark general held up one hand to signal that he wasn't done speaking yet. "That does not mean we can't use that idea. You simply need to reconsider its scale."

"Do you have a plan?" she asked, hoping he wouldn't suggest something too questionable. Large-scale hostage taking didn't sound like something she wanted to consider, but she was running out of better alternatives.

"Threaten their civilians," Jadeite suggested. "Your airships are faster than their trains. Position some above their cities and they'll think twice about leaving them undefended."

Cathy shot a dark look in Jadeite's direction. "Yeah, it's not as if that would cause them to redouble their efforts to destroy this dungeon," she said in a scathing voice. "You do remember that that's all they need to win, right?"

"You do realise that they know the troops on the airships won't disappear just because their boss was defeated, right?" Jadeite snapped back, returning her glare.

"They'll want to protect their homes and families," Tiger said, sounding hopeful. "That's what they are fighting for. Why would they go elsewhere and leave them to die?" she asked, supporting Jadeite's plan.

"It's too risky," Cathy insisted. "We don't have enough troops to send them out on missions!"

A possibility to stop the dwarfs without bloodshed and force them to the negotiation table? Ami almost bounced with excitement. However, as Cathy had correctly pointed out, the idea could backfire catastrophically. She required more information to evaluate the risks and also had no idea how to handle the logistics yet. With her enthusiasm dampened to a healthier level, she said "Snyder, you had the most contact with the dwarven captives. Do you think Jadeite's plan could work?"

The redhead's drooping eyelids opened fully. "I-I'm not sure. The ones willing to talk to me sounded very defiant and willing to sacrifice themselves."

"Bah, they probably consider themselves dead already," Torian said with contempt. "Bravery is easy when you think you have nothing left to lose." He chuckled and rubbed his hands. "Unimaginative fools."

Ami was uncomfortably reminded of Nero. Should she really approve of this plan? It basically amounted to terrorising the enemy population. Would her friends be disappointed in her if she went along with something like it, even if it was to prevent worse?

"You know, Torian, that's a good point," Tiger said. "We could end up facing soldiers who think they have nothing left but vengeance."

Jadeite narrowed his eyes at her as if wondering which side she was on.

The warlock waved his hand dismissively. "They have to protect their cities or we take them and pick them clean of riches. Imagine the faces of their soldiers if they stood helplessly before our impenetrable defences erected with their own gold!"

Ami didn't enjoy that mental image at all, but the principle of the idea seemed sound. Of course, Torian was simplifying the situation. Garrisons could be left behind, and people would flee a doomed city with any valuables they could carry. Neither of these issues was insurmountable, but, well, she really didn't want to plan how to best rob desperate people fleeing for their lives.

"Would looting a city really provide enough money to make the dungeon safe?" Snyder asked, looking directly at Ami.

"That would depend on several factors, such as the timing and the wealth of the city," she answered. "I hope we won't have to find out and the threat alone will be enough to deter an attack."

"Even if it wasn't enough, I would not be worried," Torian spoke up again. "I'm sure that between the looted gold and her Majesty's own astounding magical reserves, she will have enough power to enslave what's left of the city's midget population. That will give us a nice, expendable army to protect us from their former brethren."

Ami blinked, blind-sided by his suggestion. While she was still trying to determine if she had heard correctly, her brain was already evaluating the feasibility. She knew that spells for controlling individuals existed in her library. Theoretically, they could be combined with sympathetic magic to spread-No, bad brain! This wasn't an interesting puzzle that needed solving! She would already have gotten rid of those dark tomes if she could be sure she would never need to counter their contents!

Jadeite made a contemplative noise, attracting her attention.

To her great disappointment, he seemed to be seriously considering Torian's evil idea, looking neither horrified nor even disturbed.

Cathy, on the other hand, was glaring at the back of the warlock's head, and Snyder just closed his eyes, his mouth curving downwards in disgust.

Tiger wasn't paying any attention to the dark magician. Instead, she was throwing worried glances in Ami's direction.

"D-did I make a mistake, your Imperial Majesty?" Torian asked, having noticed that something was amiss.

Ami finally became aware that the room had taken on a faint reddish hue. Her eyes must have been burning a bright red from her quiet anger.

Puzzled about what had upset her, the warlock defaulted to grovelling. "My Empress, I didn't mean to offend you by suggesting that your own personal magic would be insufficient for-"

"Oh, just be quiet and let her think," Tiger interrupted him.

Ami forcibly reminded herself that he was simply doing his job, and doing it well. His advice was horrifying, but it would work perfectly fine for someone evil enough to apply it. She needed to keep in mind that, with a few exceptions, she only had terrible people working for her. Terrible people who would desert her if they found out she wasn't even worse than them.

She coughed into her hand and mumbled "Not you. Goblins."

The warlock eagerly accepted the lie, happy that someone else was the target of her ire. "Ah, of course. What did they do?"

"That's not important right now," Ami said. "I'll make some preparations so we will be ready to use the airship plan when it becomes necessary."

"Don't you have to sabotage the railway first?" Tiger asked, looking at her with surprise.

Ami shook her head. "I want to wait until the last moment, when the first train with soldiers leaves. Hopefully, that will force the dwarfs to lose some extra time as they re-evaluate the situation."

"Are you sure you will spot them in time?"

"I have an imp watching traffic from the city," she answered. Her attention briefly flickered to the creature in question, who was covered in soot to blend in with the black cave moss.

The imp was picking her nose and looked incredibly bored.

Cringing at the sight, Ami elaborated. "She'll teleport back to me when a train leaves the city. At that point, I'll make the tunnel cave in just in front of the station and make it unusable."

Tiger nodded in comprehension.

She turned to Torian. "I want the warlocks to locate the enemy logistics tail. The dwarfs won't want to come here without food." Targeting things over people also had the advantage of making her feel less guilty. Of course, she couldn't be sure about unintended consequences. Armies on the move tended to take the supplies they needed from the surrounding villages, no matter whether or not the inhabitants could spare them.

The chief warlock bowed. "Of course, your Majesty."

"I would also like it if the enemy soldiers never got their marching orders. Cathy, I need you assemble a few teams with soldiers who are well-suited for surgical strikes against the enemy commanders."

"The nobles and marshal, you mean?" the swordswoman asked, uncrossing her arms. "I'll see what I can do. There will be plenty of other nobles and soldiers ready to move up the command chain, though."

Ami thought for a moment. "It should be enough if incompetents end up in the open positions," she said. Feudal systems weren't exactly famous for merit-based promotions.

"How do we figure out which ones are incompetent?" Cathy asked.

"Most soldiers will be all too happy to badmouth their superiors," Jadeite said with a voice that spoke of experience. "The prisoners might know something."

Ami nodded. "Tiger, since the dwarfs seem to respect you, could you talk to them after they had some time to sleep and recover?"

"All right," her adopted sister agreed with a shrug.

"Thank you. Snyder, you-"

The red-haired acolyte looked at her, barely able to keep his eyes open.

"- you best go to bed and recover too," she finished. None of the healer's patients remained in critical condition. Since Jadeite already had a task, it was time to bring this meeting to a close. "If there are no more questions or comments, then I'd like for everyone to get started with the preparations."

"Wait," Cathy held up her hand. "How are you going to prevent the army already besieging us from attacking the moment we move out?"

The dwarfs would not attack if there was no chance for victory. At least, Ami hoped that they weren't fanatical enough to sacrifice their lives for no appreciable gain. A dungeon flush with defenders would be too difficult a target, and thus, she needed to import some of the orcs that lived in the mountains.

"Jered, I'll be arriving in a moment," she alerted her envoy through her communication spell.

The wavy-haired man rose from the pillow he was sitting on and moved to the wall of his dome-shaped tent. With his open palm, he gestured at the free space he had left, giving the go-ahead for her to teleport in.

She appeared, caught a brief glance of the glass lamp hanging from the ceiling while rotating in mid-air, and skilfully landed feet-first on the woven mats that covered the ground.

"Welcome, Mercury."

"Hello, Jered," she greeted him with a smile.

Her fluttering cloak finished its own descent, draping itself over her head and ruining an otherwise flawless landing.

With an impatient wave of her hand, she brushed the offending cloth out of her face. "Yet another drawback of imp teleportation," she muttered under her breath.

Jered looked her up and down. "You don't look like an imp to me."

Ami shuffled her feet under his inspection. "Glamoured ice golem," she explained.

"Oh, so that's why you are covered in water droplets," Jered said, his gaze pointed straight at her chest. "Nice dress, by the way."

The black garment with golden decorations resembled her Keeper uniform and gathered tiny droplets as if it was ice-cold. Keeping in theme with its wet appearance, it clung to her skin.

Blushing, Ami pulled her cloak shut tight. "No, that's actually the corruption's fault," she explained with a grimace. "The fabric is neither cold nor wet."

It also looked as if it had been chewed on by a swarm of artistically-inclined moths, but much to Ami's relief, the holes had avoided embarrassing locations. They even formed a decorative snowflake pattern.

She had bought such restraint for the price of picking a garment that had little spare fabric to begin with. Since she was used to her senshi uniform, the shortness of the dress didn't bother her, but it also left her back and shoulders uncovered. She felt almost as if she was only wearing a thin towel she had wrapped around herself.

"Tough. I didn't really have any problems with corruption outside of your dungeon," Jered said, raising an eyebrow.

"You don't count as a piece of my territory," Ami pointed out. She looked down at herself. "I just hope this won't offend the orc dignitaries."

The wavy-haired man snorted. "Dignitaries, hah. You will be fine. In fact, they don't have anything better than furs and leathers. The worst you'll have to worry about is them wondering why you aren't dressing warmer," he added with a grin.

Ami looked at the clothes that hung from one of the tent's curved bone supports. Some of them were Jered's greenish shirts, and trousers, but she also spotted several fur studded mantles she didn't remember him owning.

"Yeah, it gets cold here at times," Jered said, following her gaze. "Especially when riding." He sighed. "The nomad lifestyle isn't for me."

"The orcs were hard to track down, then?" Ami asked.

Jered grimaced. "Not exactly. Your communication spell can still be used as the lure it was originally meant to be, and it works fine on orcs. The main difficulty was the number of different tribes. They travel around a lot, they don't have fixed routes, they can't stand each other, and they tend to greet foreigners by ambushing them," he listed.

"Ambushes?" Ami asked, her eyes widening. She quickly checked Jered for injuries. "Is everyone all right?"

"Don't worry, not a scratch," he said. "For some reason, they were reluctant to actually go through with an attack on a group of big guys in black armour flying an obvious Keeper banner. I didn't even have to rely on your shield amulets despite a few tense standoffs."

"I'm glad you are unharmed," she said.

"My backside doesn't feel unharmed," replied, feigning a wince as he patted his trousers. "Damn clops."

"Clops?"

"Some kind riding lizard critter. Big as a cow, feathers, long tail- oh, I'll just show you." He motioned for her to follow him, brushed aside both curtains blocking the tent's entrance, and stepped into the sunlight.

Ami joined him, enjoying the warmth of the sun on her fake skin. It had been too long since she had been outside in her own body, or at least something closely resembling it.

Her first glimpse of the orcish camp showed her perhaps a dozen tents like the one behind her, spread out inside a narrow valley over an area the size of a village. Groups of two to five orcs were outside, cooking meat on open fires or chatting with each other.

She could also see a few of the animals Jered had mentioned, tied to poles next to each tent. They reminded her of snake-faced llamas with long, lizard-like tails. Covered in a shaggy brown coat made of feathers, the beasts were scraping moss off rocks with their tongues. In her opinion, their wide backs didn't look particularly comfortable.

Someone gasped to her left. "Your Majesty!"

Surprised, she turned and heard two clangs as armoured knees struck the ground.

A duo of guards in black plate armour knelt before her, flanking the entrance of Jered's tent. Even kneeling,the two were only a head shorter than her.

Through the open visor of the left guard's helmet, a hint of rapidly paling pink skin was visible. It was the fleshy pink of a human face, not the intense bubble gum colour of orcish skin. "E-empress! I was not aware that y-you would be visiting us," the man stuttered, his head bowed.

She inclined her head in an awkward bow, having no idea how to respond to people spontaneously genuflecting to her. She could feel a minion bond from both the human and his orcish companion, so at least she didn't need to wonder about the cause of their reverence even if she couldn't remember their faces.

"At ease, both of you," Jered said before Ami's silence could be misinterpreted. "Her Majesty arrived on short notice. Dorn, go inform the others about her arrival. Gerno, call together the tribesmen and tell them that the Empress is here to take over the negotiations."

"Of course, master Jered!" both chorused. They saluted and left; the human moved towards a nearby tent while the orcish guard approached a big drum.

The first drumbeats echoed through the valley and caught the attention of the orcs outside. They turned to stare in Ami's direction even as more of the pink-skinned creatures appeared from their tents.

Jered leaned closer to her and said in a low voice "To be honest, I'm relieved I can turn this headache over to you. I've lost count of how many times I wanted to beat some sense into these so-called diplomats."

Ami turned sharply to look at him, her brow furrowed in worry. "They don't want to join us?" she asked in a small voice, well aware that talking to people wasn't one of her strong points. She didn't have anything that made her more convincing than him, aside perhaps from being scarier.

"I mentioned before that the tribes don't get along with each other, right? To put it succinctly, they are all behaving like little children who want the biggest piece of a cake. Or don't want the others to get any cake. Or refuse to eat their cake in the presence of the others. Or- well, you get the picture."

The meeting with the orcish representatives was taking place outside, around a crude table crafted from a single fallen tree. Its trunk had been split lengthwise and placed on the ground with the flat side up, providing a flat surface for placing various earthen plates and mugs.

In deference to Ami's rank, the orcs had reserved one entire side of the table for her and her staff, while the eleven representatives from the tribes sat together on the other side. They had also seated her on the largest pile of pillows present on the meadow and served her the best piece of meat from the boar roasting on a spit nearby.

So far, she hadn't dared verify that claim about the liver resting on the plate before her. Not only was her knife currently stuck to some resin still seeping from the table's wood, but the piece of organ meat did not look appetising at all. Its intense smell overpowered all the more pleasant aromas in the area, but at least, it made it easy for her to maintain an expression that matched her current disgust at the state of the negotiations.

"... never work together with that Bear Fang scum!" Lercis, an orc who had decorated his muscular arms with ash-based paint, thrust his hand demonstratively at his right neighbour.

Said neighbour flinched back from the fork in Lercis's hand, his face turning an angry purple as he prepared to shout something back. "I don't have to take this from-"

Ami was growing more and more frustrated with the proceedings. Two hours wasted with insults, pointless squabbling, and one case of arson. Jered had been spot on when he had compared the orcs to bickering children. With a sudden jerk of her head, she looked up from her plate. "Enough! Stop it already, all of you!" she said in a raised voice.

The orcs along the table fell silent and looked at her, their muscles tensing as they went very still.

Only one of them wasn't bothered by her outburst and raised an eyebrow at her. Glowing coals covered his armour like scales, surrounding him with hazy smoke trails.

"Yes, that includes you, Guldor," she said, fixing him with her stare. He was a priest of some dark god, so she was inclined to dislike him by default. His actions so far hadn't raised his opinion of him, either "Especially you. If you set anyone else on fire, I'll remove you from this table myself."

The orc with his shaved head looked away first.

Now that she had silence and their attention, she felt awkward under their stares. Using her annoyance to keep her natural shyness at bay, she pressed on. "The way you are bargaining does not make sense," she continued.

"We are negotiating in the best interests of our tribes," an excessively wrinkly orc protested. Perhaps Irgar was so old that he wasn't as attached to his continued survival as the others.

Ami shook her head. "No, you are not," she voiced a suspicion that had been building for some time. "None of you want to provide me with warriors unless the other tribes do too, since doing so would shift the balance of power against you."

"Exactly!" Irgar confirmed, and the others nodded along with him.

"And then each of you keeps bargaining for special advantages over the others," Ami said in the same tone of voice.

"Which is perfectly reasonable," Lercir said, apparently encouraged by her calm summary.

"Advantages which are completely insignificant in comparison to the ridiculously generous offers I have already made," she continued her train of thought.

"No kidding," Jered commented in her head, his exasperation clearly audible even through the distortion from the communication spell.

"Oh, I'll be happy to ask for more if you insist," Guldor said in a mocking tone.

The orc sitting closest to him coughed violently and rolled backwards off his pillow. Another orc threw himself sideways from his seat, putting more distance between himself and the dark priest.

Ami ignored the interjection. "Offers I only made because I want warriors quickly, and which will only be available for a limited time. You stand much more to lose from not accepting them than you stand to gain from any individual advantages you could negotiate. Also, I am well aware that there are no chieftains here to talk to me."

"Ah, well, they don't really want to risk getting mind-controlled into a decision," one of the less outstanding negotiators said meekly. "No offence intended."

He had a point there, Ami secretly admitted. Still, she chose to continue with her conclusion. "Granted, but when I look at the whole picture, I am getting the feeling that you are simply stalling because you do not want to work for me." She fell silent, observing their reaction to her statement while hoping she was wrong.

A few of the negotiators ducked their heads as if hoping to make themselves smaller targets while others started sweating. Half of them began stammering protests in uncertain voices, making it hard to understand any of them.

"T- that's-"

"But-"

"How are we-"

"There's a good expl-"

Unfortunately, Ami couldn't tell from their terrified reaction whether they were afraid because she had hit the nail on the head or because they expected her to punish them for the perceived slight. Quickly, she raised her hands as if to ward off their hasty explanations. "Calm down! I won't be offended by anyone refusing to work for me!" She would be extremely worried about being unable to gather enough troops instead, but there was no need to tell them that.

The orcs fell quiet at her words, a few of them looking surprised.

"I will, however, be offended by people wasting my time. Also, if I'm right, I want to know the reason for your reluctance," Ami continued, trying to put as much steel into her voice as she could manage.

The diplomats looked at each other quietly, not meeting her eyes.

"Your gold won't be of any use to us if we are dead," Irgar broke the silence. Beads of perspiration gleamed in the wrinkles of his forehead. "I shall be frank. Keepers who try to take on the dwarfs don't last long. You," he stared directly into Ami's eyes "Have yet to prove that you can do better!"

His closest neighbours backed away from him discretely. When a few seconds passed without something violent and painful happening to him, some of them started looking a little disappointed.

Emboldened by the lack of smiting, the elder orc continued. "None of the Keepers who have tried invading these lands have held out for longer than two weeks," he elaborated. "Most didn't even last a single one."

"Bartholomeus," Guldor objected from the back.

The orc glared at him over his shoulder. "Bartholomeus' infiltration only got as far as it did because he distracted the dwarfs by feeding his subordinate Keepers into the meat grinder."

"Bartholomeus?" Ami mentally asked Jered, doing her best to keep her face neutral.

"The Keeper responsible for the dwarven civil war about a decade ago," he answered, his voice distorted by the transmission spell."Got killed by Baron Leopold, and good riddance."

Ami digested the new information with a sinking feeling. The Keepers defeated in the first week had probably lost to the forces of a local count and his barons; the same kind of attack she had already fended off successfully. This was valuable information, since it gave her a rough estimate of when to expect the second attack.

"But the dark empress has already been discovered," Irgar pointed out. "Distracting the dwarfs is no longer possible for her."

"Unless she's the distraction," the dark priest speculated while looking at Ami.

"Probing question about my strategy aside," she said, "the reason you don't want to join me is because you expect me to lose?"

"No disrespect intended, Empress," Lercir said, bowing his head. "You do have quite the reputation for resourcefulness, but we have seen dungeon after dungeon smashed into ruins by those hairy midgets."

"It's not like we don't want to fight them, but even Keeper Mukrezar has never tried to invade their lands," someone whined.

"And there is nothing that could convince you to fight on my side?" Ami said, hoping she didn't sound too desperate there.

Guldor smirked. "Sure there is. You could simply prove that you can handle the dwarfs," he said. "Survive. Seize a city or something. Turn one of their armies into cinders. That kind of thing."

So she would get her troops when she no longer needed them, Ami thought to herself. According to what Torian had said earlier, conquering a city was something that might happen in the near future, if she somehow managed to deal with the problem of the army that was surrounding her dungeon. "Do you agree with him?" Ami asked the others for confirmation.

The white-haired and knobby-nosed heads along the table nodded, some more enthusiastically than others.

"Yes, in principle," Irgar said. "If you showed us that you are strong enough to beat the dwarfs, then our only objection to joining you would be gone."

"Which would be easier with you on my side," she tried again.

"Oh, we will be assisting you indirectly," Lercir said.

Intrigued, she asked. "How so?"

"With the enemy troops away to focus on you, we'll have ample opportunities to raid the countryside. They'll have to divert some of their soldiers for the futile task of hunting us down," he said matter-of-factly.

"What? No!" Ami could already see burning villages and dead townspeople in her mind's eye, and it would all be her fault.

Lercir rocked back. "No?" he squeaked, his pinprick-sized pupils reflecting the red glow of her eyes.

"Those are my future lands you will be raiding! I need them intact!" she said, blurting out the first somewhat reasonable justification that entered her mind.

"My, you very confident Empress," Guldor said, chuckling.

The orcs around him would have had to climb onto their neighbours' laps to back away any further.

"Well," Irgar said quickly, attempting to defuse the situation. "We could offer you some of the loot as tribute if-"

"I don't want loot!" Ami interrupted him. "I want you to leave the people alone so they will still be around to work the land for me when I have conquered this realm." There. Hopefully, that sounded enough like a reason an evil Keeper would have to protect civilians.

"You think the dwarfs will serve you?" Lercis said, sounding flabbergasted. "That is, I mean, I'm not doubting you, obviously," he backtracked quickly.

The other orcs were whispering quietly to each other, sounding both dubious and intractable.

"...think she's serious?"

"...won't be around for long anyway..."

She needed discourage them from their raids, which would be hard if they didn't believe she would be able to back up her threats. "Jered, do you have any idea?" she communicated mentally.

"Raiding is part of their way of life, " he answered quickly. "Words won't get them to stop."

Ami swallowed. That wasn't what she wanted to hear. Perhaps she could limit the damage? "Do you understand? Wealth is created by people. Carry off whatever you like, but don't kill the people so they will keep producing wealth. It's simply good business sense."

"Well, yes," Guldor agreed. "It would be wasteful to exterminate any but the useless and decrepit."

Ami clenched her fists in anger as she imagined just what and whom he was talking about. She had to leave before she lost her temper and did something to that disgusting villain, jeopardising any future help she might get from the orcs as well as risking to anger another dark god. "It's good we understand each other," she said, struggling to prevent the words from coming out as a snarl.

Some of her hosts flinched when she stood abruptly.

"Thank you for your hospitality," she said as she inclined her head the minimal amount required by politeness. "Something has come up that I must deal with. Jered, have the troops prepare to leave. I'll come pick you up shortly."

"Of course." He said, glancing over at the orcs for their reactions.

If anything, they seemed relieved about the planned departure.

"Well, so much for the negotiations," Jered commented secretly. "Can't say I'm sad about leaving, but it's a pity we won't get any new troops."

Ami nodded silently, feeling bitter disappointment now that her anger was abating. Without the support of the tribes, she would need to try one of her riskier ideas.

Last edited: Aug 26, 2016

Recruiting Trouble

Originally on 2015-11-14T01:36:00

Low-hanging clouds wafted past the massive tower that had appeared on the peak of Whitemountain. Together with the constant drizzle, they made it hard to identify the details of the distant structure, such as the crenellations topping the many balconies. The entire building resembled a step pyramid that had been stretched until it pointed into the sky like an accusing finger.

Iton lowered his telescope and automatically started cleaning its lens as he retreated from the arrow slit. "That thing gives me the creeps," his whisper echoed through the cave, addressed to the other dwarf within the watch post. "When did she even build it?"

"It was just suddenly there after a big cloud passed," Datan answered with a shrug. He had the tanned look of someone who spent a lot of time outside. "Had to look twice to make sure I wasn't imagining things."

"I wonder what she's planning. What good does a fortress do her all the way up there? She's underground; we aren't going to make a detour just to besiege it." Having wiped the raindrops off his telescope to his satisfaction, he approached the narrow window to the outside again.

"Hell if I know what she needs it for. Though..."

"You have an idea?" Iton asked as he tried to bring the dark structure into better focus.

"Nah, it's probably nothing. Doesn't make sense," his fellow scout said. "It was a silly idea."

"Humour me. I could use a good laugh," Iton insisted.

"It's not exactly a funny thought," Datan said with a sigh. "All right. Do you see that staircase spiralling its way up there on the outside of the building?"

He zoomed in on one of the corners of the building, where rainwater fountained out of a drain in the wall. He could see some wide steps rounding the corner there, where the wall serving as their railing didn't hide them. "Hmm, yeah, I see it. What about it?"

"Well, together with the general shape of the building, it kind of reminds me of the death god's ziggurats."

"What? Yeah, you were right. That's not funny at all. I hope that's not really some kind of dark temple." With jerky motions, Iton swept his telescope left and right. "At least I don't see any- wait, what the- get over here and look at this!"

"Did you actually spot some walking dead?" Datan asked, a hint of nervousness in his voice as he approached.

"No, look up there, at the sky above the tower!"

A large, vaguely fish-shaped object descended through the storm clouds, its cylindrical hull only a shade lighter than the darkness above. Taut chains with links as thick as fists anchored the vessel to the top of the looming building.

"That- nothing that big should be able to fly!" Datan exclaimed.

"Tell that to that thing," Iton grumbled. "What the hell is it? Some kind of weird dragon?"

"I have heard rumours that Keeper Mercury has some flying transports. Could be one of those," Datan replied.

The vessel continued its descent, shaking in the wind. Large winches reeled it in closer as they spooled up the chains. Within a few minutes, its cabin touched down on the tower's top floor.

A hatch in the cabins side opened, disgorging indistinct figures. They spread out until most of them were hidden by the building's walls, but some remained visible over the crenellations.

"Filthy orcs!" Datan exclaimed. "I'd recognise those hunched-over silhouettes anywhere!"

"Oh crap, she wasn't supposed to get reinforcements past us! We need to warn Count Ornish at once!"

"You write the message, I prepare the dog," Datan offered. A hunter in civilian life, he was used to working with trained animals. He whistled once and started rummaging around in his backpack.

Loud barks answered his call, approaching rapidly. A grey terrier, not much bigger than a cat, emerged from the opening leading deeper into the mountain. The floppy-eared animal dashed straight towards Datan, tail swishing.

"That's a good dog," he said as he patted the animal on the head. "Sit. Good boy."

"A flying object docked at the new tower, bypassing our siege line. Delivered an unknown number and type of soldiers. Orcs identified among them," Iton read the message he had composed out loud. "Do you think that's enough?"

"It's succinct and accurate," the other dwarf answered while affixing a small barrel to the dog's collar. "The Count will have his wizards take a closer look, anyway."

"I suppose so. Here." He handed over the message to Datan, ignoring the terrier's growling as he approached.

The hunter quickly slipped the rolled-up note into the empty container hanging from his dog's neck and screwed it shut. "Good. Now go find Dolon. Understand me? Go to Dolon!"

With a happy woof, the animal darted away, its claws clicking on the rock floor.

"Do you think the Count will be able to stop those reinforcements?" Iton asked as he resumed watching the tower.

"Maybe if he figures out where the ships pick them up," Datan answered. "If not, we'll have to pray that the elves arrive soon."

Tiger was in her room when her wristband flashed a warning. Someone was scrying on her.

Her mother perhaps? For a split second, she wished she was wearing something more substantial. Surprised, she wondered why she was feeling that way. Her lack of shyness was something she cherished. It was one of the few personality traits entirely her own, something she could be sure she hadn't inherited from Ami. Mum probably wouldn't approve of her showing that much skin in public, though.

Satisfied that she had solved the mystery, she arrived at her desk and removed a crystal ball from her drawer. The scrying alarm usually meant that someone from her home world was trying to contact her, but it wasn't always the case. Sometimes, she spotted unknown and usually bearded individuals when she checked.

The orb in her hand quickly tracked the person scrying on her. The familiar girl with long black hair was definitely no wizard, dwarf, or enemy Keeper.

"Mars! Hi!" Tiger said with a smile, happy to see the sailor senshi's face. She immediately recognised Rei's room at the Hikawa shrine, having seen it several times while teaching the other girls flight spells.

"Hello, Tiger," Mars greeted her. She wasn't alone.

Another face pushed itself into the view from the side. Sailor Jupiter, kneeling next to the red-skirted sailor senshi at the low table, smiled and waved her hand. "Hello!" the taller girl greeted.

"Hi," Tiger answered, her own smile growing wider. Makoto had a special place in her heart. Of the senshi, she was the only one that Ami had never met in person. In fact, Tiger was pretty sure that she had interacted more with the brunette than her sister, even if it was only by talking through the crystal ball.

It was pretty nice to have at least one friendly relationship that she had built all by herself. One she could be sure hadn't started out as pity over her being a partial memory-clone of Ami.

She tried to push those thoughts aside. Her friendship with Usagi, Rei, and Luna was a good thing, even if she wondered about its origins when she was in a thinking mood.

She had been thinking way too much for her tastes since the battle.

"Sailor Moon was supposed to be here too," Mars said apologetically, "but she managed to get detention. Again." She wasn't actually rolling her eyes as she explained Usagi's absence, but her tone indicated that it was a close thing.

"She'll probably arrive later," Sailor Jupiter said quickly. "But, is everything all right over there?" She asked looking straight at Tiger and doing a poor job at hiding her worry.

Apparently, her face had been betraying some of her less than pleasant thoughts. "I'm fine, just thinking about some unpleasant things," she said. "We had a lot of trouble earlier. The dwarfs attacked, we had to beat them back, and, well, there were losses on both sides," she said, her shoulders slumping.

"Oh no," Mars said, lowering her eyes. "I hope you didn't lose anyone important to you."

Jupiter's eyes went wide, and she gasped. "That's horrible! Are you hurt? What happened? How is Ami?" She leaned forward, her face filling out the crystal ball as she tried to inspect Tiger for injuries.

"I'm fine, I was helping out in the infirmary, not fighting at the front lines," Tiger assured them, feeling a little overwhelmed by the deluge of questions. "Ami wasn't in any danger either because she coordinated the battle from her command centre." She scratched her head. "And, uh, I didn't really know any of the minions who died on our side."

The ghost of a smile flitted over Jupiter's face. "That's a relief. Not exactly good, but at least you aren't grieving."

"Well, I think Ami is taking the deaths pretty hard, even though she did everything she could to avoid them and it's the dwarfs' own fault for attacking us," Tiger admitted.

"Do you think she needs someone to talk about it?" Mars asked, sounding concerned.

Tiger shrugged. "She's already back to planning and travelling around working on stuff. If you contacted her now, you'd probably interrupt her during something important."

"Oh." Mars looked disappointed. "Are you sure she isn't just keeping herself busy so she doesn't have to think about the deaths?"

"Yes, we aren't out of danger yet and she can't waste time," she answered with conviction. She paused as she reconsidered. Just because Ami really needed to be busy right now didn't mean she wasn't using her work as a convenient distraction. Huh. "I suppose she could be doing what you said, but there really is a lot of work she can't put off until later."

"Well, tell her to contact us as soon as possible, okay?" Mars said.

"Sure."

"So, you were helping people in the infirmary?" Jupiter asked. "Are you interested in becoming a doctor too?"

Tiger's stomach churned at the memories. "Not any more," she admitted, suppressing a shudder at the thought of having to bear the screams of the wounded and the blood and the stench for hours each day. Even if her adopted mother would have been proud of her. "I learned that it's not a job for me. I- I don't understand why Ami wants to subject herself to something like that all the time."

"Helping people can be very satisfying," Jupiter said.

Tiger pondered this. "Maybe if those people don't want you dead," she allowed after a moment.

Jupiter's face fell, and she visibly lacked a good answer.

Mars broke the awkward silence. "Well, most of a doctor's work isn't about dealing with the aftermath of a battle. Perhaps you could give it a try again when things are more peaceful."

"Perhaps," Tiger said and sighed. "This entire situation with the dwarfs is so annoying. I wish I could do something about it. All this sitting around and hoping that Ami will fix things is so frustrating!"

"I know the feeling," Jupiter said, nodding. "Er, not waiting for Mercury in particular, of course, but wanting to go out there and stopping the evildoers." She scratched the back of her head. "Though I guess the dwarfs aren't really evildoers."

"They are ruthless enough," Tiger answered. "You know what gets me most?" she asked in a quiet voice. "I think I could do it. Drive them off, I mean."

Both other girls leaned in closer, their eyes large.

"Really? How?" Jupiter asked.

"But there's some kind of problem with your idea, right?" Mars asked, showing more insight than her taller friend.

Tiger looked down. "Ami wouldn't like it. At all," she admitted. "I, I could possess her and use her powers to wipe out enough of the dwarfs that the rest run for their lives."

Mars' and Jupiter's eyes were still wide, but now their faces looked appalled.

"It could work! I mean, she would have to be unconscious and normally the dungeon heart wouldn't let me, but since it's for her own good it should make an exception!" she pressed on before she lost her courage, the words spilling out of her.

"No! Don't do that!" Jupiter said, waving her hands frantically as if she had to stop Tiger from leaving and implementing her plan right this moment.

"That's a terrible idea!" Mars agreed, shaking her head. She narrowed her eyes at the crystal ball. "There are so many things wrong with it, I don't even know where to start!"

"But it would keep us safe and most of the dwarfs too and Mum wouldn't have to worry and Ami wouldn't be responsible so she wouldn't need to blame herself!" Tiger protested.

"You can't kill innocent people! Do you think your Mum wants you to kill innocent people?" Jupiter asked, wringing her hands.

Tiger flinched. She didn't want to do anything that would make her mother see her any less as her real daughter. Being not even human, she already had a poor start. She hated that she cared so much about this, those weren't even her own memories! "T-they aren't really innocent if they want to attack us," she objected weakly.

"They think you invaded them first," Mars said. "And while Ami might not blame herself," she sounded rather dubious about that, "she would rightly blame you!"

"I know. I expect it, but she's smart enough that she will eventually realise that there weren't any better options."

Mars' violet eyes stared straight into Tiger's. "I don't believe that, but let's assume that's true. What about trust, then? Do you really want to lose her trust?"

She swallowed. No, she really didn't, which was more of a reason for her to not go through with her idea than the possible disapproval of those she didn't care about.

Jupiter didn't even try to formulate a reasoned argument and went straight for begging. "Please, please don't try to do this."

"A-all right." Tiger hung her head in defeat. "I'll trust Ami to solve this her way."

"Thank you," Mars said, relief chasing her frown away.

"Actually, what is she doing?" Jupiter asked.

"Well, since we currently have some trouble recruiting more soldiers, she is planning to deceive the dwarfs," Tiger gladly accepted the change of topic. "We pretend to have more troops than we really do so they are too scared to attack."

"Makes sense," Mars said, nodding once.

"How is she doing that?" Jupiter wanted to know.

"She built this huuuge tower on top of the mountain," Tiger said, raising her arms over her head and putting her fingers together like a roof. "You have to take a look later, it's really impressive since it's meant to be impossible to miss. She's using it as an airport."

"Airport?" Jupiter asked, a hint of distaste flickering over her face.

"For airships. She sends them out to some remote mountains with some inflatable orc dolls-"

"Inflatable orc dolls," Mars repeated, a disbelieving expression on her face. From her deadpan tone of voice, it was clear she was imagining some kind of humanoid pink balloon.

"Jadeite enhanced them with a little glamour," Tiger elaborated. "They look pretty realistic from afar and can twitch a little. Anyway, the airship comes back with what looks like a load full of orcs. It lands, some real orcs enter through a secret hatch below and pretend to disembark, and the dwarfs think we have more troops than we really do."

"Is it working?" Jupiter asked, sounding interested. "It sounds as if a lot could go wrong."

Tiger shrugged. "Who knows? The dwarfs have been hiding in their fortifications since the attack. Anyway, this isn't just to deceive them. It's also because Jadeite is stuck here in the dungeon."

Both senshi blinked with puzzled looks on their faces.

"He can't accompany the airships and guide them with magic, so they need crews who know what they are doing. It's training," she explained.

"Ohhh."

"Why didn't you just say that first?" Mars asked, frowning briefly.

"Anyway, Ami hasn't entirely given up on recruiting yet," Tiger continued. "That's the part of her plan I don't like at all."

The swimming ritual chamber didn't show that it had been hurriedly carved out of a block of frozen sea water. It formed a spherical bubble within the ice, serving as the frame for a huge gyroscope. In the centre of the gimbal, just above the huge rotor, rested the platform that the mechanism was designed to stabilise. Intricate wards covered the outer region of its surface, interspersed with sapphires intended to boost any spells cast within.

Ami stood on the disc-shaped surface, double-checking her rushed handiwork for flaws she might have missed.

Dimmed sunlight that fell through the part of the dome above the surface assisted her in her task, but the shifting gimbal rings cast soft shadows onto her.

The room grew even darker when a serpentine tentacle as thick as her torso rose from the ocean and loomed over the vessel. Water fountained as the tower of pale flesh hammered down on the dome.

Ami flinched instinctively away from the blow, even though she knew that there was a thick barrier between herself and the descending mass.

To her side, Torian let out a high-pitched, unmanly squeal.

The ceiling shook from the tentacle's impact and groaned under the pressure. Pushed downwards, the entire vessel dipped deeper into the water.

She stumbled as the ground dropped underneath her feet, put off-balance by the way the room tilted sideways around the platform.

Torian threw himself against the large vertical pipe shielding the gyroscope's spin axle, wrapping his arms around it to remain upright.

Ami cast a worried glance at him even as she compensated for the bobbing motion by taking a wider-legged stance. To her relief, he seemed to be overreacting. After all, the platform he shared with her remained completely horizontal, courtesy of the gyroscope.

"I-is this part of y-your plan, your Majesty?" the warlock stuttered, not taking his eyes off the ceiling. They bulged when a second tentacle joined the first, hand-sized suckers flattening themselves against the ice.

Muscles pulsed under tattered, black-veined skin, and the sea water rushed to cover the dome as the squid pulled more of it under the surface.

"I was hoping for smaller targets," she admitted, her gaze transfixed on the zombie squid. She was pretty sure that the groping tentacles weren't strong enough to crack the dome, but she didn't feel quite so confident about the animal's beak.

"I'm getting seasick," Torian complained as he clutched the pipe like a limpet. "Please, can't you remove that thing somehow?"

"Well, I-"

Splashes of black liquid splattered onto the dome, blotting out another patch of the sky.

For a moment, Ami thought it was ink, but then she saw that the first tentacle had gone limp.

Like an avalanche, the maggot-coloured appendage slid downwards, waves fountaining around it as it slid underwater. Tar-like, rotten blood continued spilling from the amputated stump.

A reddish blur shot towards the other limb wrapped around the vessel. Rabixtrel brought his scythe down in a flash, severing the tentacle. With steam billowing around his pumping hooves, he raced toward the bulk of his enemy. He jumped, barrelling straight through a small wave to hit the animal horns-first.

Ami blinked as she stared at the hoof prints melted into the ice in her reaper's wake. "Never mind. It won't be a problem for much longer."

She had no idea how her horned reaper had managed to remain on the rolling vessel's surface, but she had no doubt that he would swiftly dispatch the enemy.

"I- I see." Torian seemed a little calmer without the aquatic monster rocking the ship. At least he had finally let go of the pipe.

Seeing the spin axle reminded Ami to keep the gyroscope's rotor turning. A few cranks with her keeper hand, and she could hear the spinning noise grow higher-pitched as the rotor increased its speed. Good. It wouldn't do for the platform to tip over at a critical moment. Or at all.

"Haven't we attracted sufficient attention yet?" the warlock asked, his nervous gaze darting across the ocean's surface. "They are pushing us away from the coast!"

She glanced in the direction he indicated.

The dune-like clouds of poisoned dust drifting across the beaches of the Avatar Islands looked smaller than they had before.

Outside, the water was darkening with the sheer amount of zombies that were flocking towards the vessel. The largest of them was a young whale with only the ribcage remaining of its chest cavity. Despite its size, it was still only slightly larger than the chunks of giant squid currently sinking to the bottom of the ocean.

It was probably for the best that Torian didn't have Keeper sight. He was already nervous enough. While the animated corpses assembled here represented only a small fraction of those that had been at the high temple of Crowned Death, there were still enough to threaten any conventional fleet.

"Yes, I believe there are more than enough targets," Ami confirmed.

"Oh. Great," the warlock muttered with little conviction. He had good reason to be afraid. His undead control spell must have put him quite high on the list of people whom the death god disapproved of.

Ami hoped that Crowned Death wasn't personally paying attention right now. She also wished she knew how much influence and oversight the dark god had over existing undead. If it went beyond what she estimated, her entire plan was doomed to failure from the start. Still, the fact that the vampires back in her dungeon hadn't betrayed her yet was good sign. Trying to keep her voice calm and confident, she asked "Are you ready to cast the spell?"

"Yes, I believe so, your Majesty." His gaze moved over the outer circle of the stable platform, where intricate magical designs covered the floor. "Depending on the amount of subjects within range, you may need to provide me with additional power," he cautioned.

Ami approached and put one hand on his staff, ready to channel more of her mana into the device, should it become necessary. "All right, I'm ready."

With a nervous shudder, he glanced at the multiple shadows moving around the vessel, scratching, hammering and biting at the ice. "If I may ask, do we have a good escape route in case this doesn't work?"

"Yes, of course," Ami answered. "I thought you were confident about your modifications allowing your spell to maintain control of more than a single target?"

He gulped. "Well, the theory is sound, but the tests were on a smaller scale than this." Quieter, he added "Much smaller."

"If there's anyone who can do this, it's you. You invented the undead-control spell, after all," she said. "There's no one better than you to cast its area version." He was the greatest expert on this new ritual she had, but that wasn't the main reason she wasn't casting it herself. She wanted to be able to observe everything with her visor in case Crowned Death took notice of what they were doing.

"I believe you are selling your own talents too short, my Empress," Torian said, a hint of excitement creeping into his voice. "Well then, I suppose it is time to show these zombies who's boss." He gripped his staff in both hands, closed his eyes, and started chanting.

Ami could feel magic flow through the implement as the spell's energies built up in the air around them and concentrated in the magic circle around the edge of the platform.

The arcane inscriptions lit up briefly before discharging in a single pulse when Torian stopped chanting.

From one moment to the other, the zombies swarming around the ship went limp.

"Did it work?" she asked him.

Torian opened his eyes and slowly looked at the zombies suspended motionless in the water. "I- yes, I think so?" he said, frowning.

"That doesn't sound entirely reassuring," she said cautiously.

Her Keeper sight showed her that all zombies out to a good distance around the vessel had gone completely still, only moving from the effects of currents and gravity.

"Could you be more specific, please?"

"I'm not sure. My control feels off. Numb. It's different from the single target spell, and I feel as if I should be able to command them, but- ah, here we go."

Ami summoned her computer and started typing, switching through the vision modes of her visor. "Keep telling me what's going on so I can make sense of these readings," she instructed.

"I got some of them to move. Over there, on the hull, that big ugly crab." He pointed at large crustacean with only one scissor, which it was using to wave at them. "I'm getting more of them to follow my orders now," he continued, sounding a little more confident. "It's strange though, there's nothing in the ritual design that would account for time-delayed effects."

"I think I can see what's happening," Ami said as she stared at the readout on the screen. She had been expecting to see connections going out from Torian to all of the creatures affected by his spell, similar to the way her dungeon heart linked to her underlings.

However, only a single connection went from the warlock to the closest crab. In turn, the crab was connected to a rotten shark, said shark was connected to a smaller fish, and so on. The zombies were lined up on the single connection like pearls on a string.

From the unconnected zombies, half-formed links reached like feelers toward the last element of the chain. Whenever one made contact, it attached itself. This prompted the remaining free-floating links to dart toward the new end of the chain.

"Your spell is giving you control of one creature after the other," she informed Torian. "I assume that the test group wasn't large enough for you to notice the effect."

"Figures that the vampires still managed to be worthless even when they were good for something," the warlock grumbled. "Hmm. I suppose this explains why it's growing gradually harder to suppress their wills."

Ami looked up with alarm. "Are you having trouble?"

Torian shook his head. "No, they are only animals, after all. It's like holding up a weight with my mind that's slowly growing heavier. Hmm, doesn't really feel like a bunch of animals struggling individually. More like a school of fish moving in unison? When did that happen?"

"It looks as if some of the control magic is getting trapped in the link, propagating back and forth between the zombies and causing them to synch up," she reported what she was seeing on her screen.

"What? Animals shouldn't be able to do that, you need a caster to-" Torian reeled as if struck. He blinked and shook his head. Frowning, he briefly inspected his hand before turning towards her and narrowing his eyes. "What is this blasphemy, Keeper?"

Ami's heart skipped a beat, and she stared at him with her mouth open. Had she heard that correctly? She shifted into a more defensive stance as her thoughts raced to figure out what was going on. His inflection had been that of a stranger. Had he somehow been possessed?

On her palmtop' screen, all of the zombies were pulsing in synch now. More disturbingly, each and everyone had turned to look directly at her.

"Um, could you clarify?" she asked warily. The worst-case scenario - Crowned Death having somehow taken control of her chief warlock - seemed unlikely. He was looking at her as if he didn't recognise her, rather than cursing her or trying to kill her. He had called her 'Keeper', but her glowing red eyes made that obvious to anyone.

"I am talking about this," the warlock said, sweeping his arm towards the undead creatures surrounding the vessel.

Ami found the gesture pompous and arrogant, but that was admittedly not entirely unexpected from Torian.

"If you need an undead army, then there are easier and less unwise ways to gain one, Keeper," Torian - or whoever was possessing him - said.

"Are you trying to convert me?" Ami blurted out, unable to keep some of her surprise from seeping into her voice.

"Ambitious, controls a horned reaper, and quick on the uptake," the warlock said, nodding. "The great Crowned Death, Lord of the Undead and Master of Unlife, could always use more worshippers like you."

If the situation had been different, she would have found it funny. Instead, she stared with horror at Torian's face, worried about its mask-like stiffness. "Hold on," she stalled. "First, I wish to know whom I am talking to."

Obviously, attempting to seize control of a huge group of zombies had awakened something. Had it been a trap, someone noticing and intervening, or merely an unexpected side effect? She didn't know how Crowned Death animated bodies that were already dead. Perhaps he had cut up some powerful entity and was using its pieces instead of souls? Mentally connecting enough zombies might be enough to bring back part of the original being, in that case.

She really hoped she wasn't dealing with a fragment of an Incarnation here.

"I am merely a manifestation of my Lord's power; the faint reflection of His unsurpassed glory in the vessels that serve Him," the creature moving Torian's body said.

Ami thought this sounded a little too humble for an Incarnation, but was the creature telling the truth? A bead of sweat ran down her forehead as she tried to read its stolen features. At least, she could be fairly certain that it had been created before she had come into conflict with Crowned Death, otherwise they wouldn't be having a civil conversation right now.

How could she save Torian? "I see. I am interested, but you would put me in a more amenable mood if you stopped puppeteering my warlock."

"No. Consider his loss the first part of your atonement for this transgression," the creature answered.

"Don't-"

"Are you seriously expecting forgiveness from my Lord?" the creature asked tilting its head to the side. "Still, I can see that you seem determined to insist on this point." Torian's right hand rose, a sickly glow at the tip of his index finger. "Let me make it moot."

Eyes widening, Ami slapped the digit aside with a telekinetic blow.

A thin ray of shadowy energy shot from the finger, narrowly missing the warlock's head.

Ami recognised it as a necromantic killing spell. "What are you doing?" she shouted at the possessed man. At the same time, she accessed her storage and loosened one of her stashed Shabon Spray Freezing spells at him.

The blue-tinted magic slammed into the warlock and encased him in a block of ice. She had aimed low enough that his head remained free, but everything below the neck was effectively immobilised.

"I thought that was obvious. Stopping you from wasting time on discussing something I will not budge on while also eliminating an irritant," the death god's minion replied without a hint of regret in its voice.

In fact, he sounded smug enough that Ami was sure he had more tricks up his sleeve. She was, therefore, not surprised when a ghostly outline of black flames formed around Torian.

They didn't melt the ice, but Torian's eyes shot wide open, and he started gasping for breath.

"Stop it!" she shouted, spurred on by her visor's readout. The entity was killing Torian, sucking out his life energy and dispersing it. She still didn't know what kind of creature she was dealing with, but she had seen something like its black flame before.

When the Avatar had cleansed his mantle, a similar creature had emerged from the tainted garment, smashing through multiple layers of wards with each attack.

Unfortunately, this didn't tell her how to save Torian. The Avatar had purified his mantle with powerful holy magic, which was something she simply didn't have access to.

According to her visor, Torian was running out of time. He would not survive the next few seconds if she didn't intervene. She needed to act, now!

Destroy all the zombies outside in the hopes it would disrupt her enemy? She couldn't do it fast enough to save him. Knock him out? She doubted the monster would be affected. Possess him? Impossible, he counted as captured by an enemy. What did she have that could free him from the monster's grasp?

The thing chuckled coldly, obviously enjoying her increasingly desperate expression.

She looked at her visor again. The amount of magic trapped in the links between the zombies was about the same as she had channelled into Torian's staff.

Lacking any better ideas, she cast his own undead-controlling spell on him. She didn't know if it could affect her enemy, but-

Her opponent's will crashed into her own, and she sensed a spike of gleeful satisfaction from the creature. It felt like an echo of the time Crowned Death had lured her into a trap.

Had she just made a terrible mistake? Terrified, she drew upon her reserves and pushed back against the cold, corrosive mind trying to smother her. When she had faced her opponent's master before, she had lost utterly. This time, she wasn't fighting a dark god, she reminded herself.

Nevertheless, the consequences of fighting back with anything less than her best effort were too horrible to contemplate. She concentrated, focusing enough mana that she felt as if she'd burst, and unleashed it at her enemy.

A brief flicker of surprise came from her enemy when the tsunami of power slammed into it, washing away its defences.

Seeing her opponent's weakness, she struck again, strengthening the bonds the undead-controlling spell wrapped around her target's mind. It seethed and squirmed, trying to slip from her grasp, but she refused to fall for its feints and deceptions. She had enough of an advantage in power over her opponent that she could encircle it completely and squeeze, which was exactly what she did.

Torian's head lolled to the side, and her visor showed her that he was breathing more easily now.

Her relief almost cost her when her enemy bucked to break her control.

She redoubled her efforts to crush the creature's will, succeeding little by little. After what felt like an eternity, the last of its resistance crumbled, and she greedily took the chance to take complete control.

Her opponent's presence remained chained in a corner of her mind; an angry sun radiating cold fury. Even now, keeping the monster contained required continuous effort.

Tired, she let herself sink to the floor and plucked the warlock from his ice prison. She couldn't diagnose anything physically wrong with him that wasn't related to being encased in ice, but he remained unconscious. As she had no way to deal with his current lack of life energy, she opted to deal with his lack of warmth instead.

A few brief conjurations later, the unconscious man was lying in a tub of hot water, with his head secure on a headrest so it couldn't slide below the surface.

With his safety ensured as best as she could under the circumstances, she sped up the gyroscope's rotor once more and took stock of her situation.

The inside of the icy room had brightened, red light reflecting off its curving walls. Her eyes were glowing like crimson lamps, a testament to the large amount of mana she was channelling in order to keep her opponent suppressed.

She could understand how the creature had overwhelmed Torian in moments. It was powerful, far stronger than she would have expected from something cobbled together from a horde of zombies and an experimental mind control spell.

Then again, a zombie didn't move without a source of power. If the thing was responsible for animating each and every corpse caught in the spell, then it would by necessity have access to an intimidating amount of magical strength.

She stared at the army of dead animals floating around her vessel, trying to estimate their number. Her new thrall would have the information, and with some effort, she managed to wrestle the knowledge from it.

At first, she couldn't believe the number. According to the being's senses, it was currently controlling a little more than one hundred thousand separate bodies.

She blinked. That couldn't be right, could it? Investigating more closely, she noted that the vast majority of these bodies were relatively small, about the size of her boots. The total mass was less than that of one of the giant tentacles that had been attached to Crowned Death's high temple, then.

Satisfied that her mind-prisoner - she decided to call it a spirit, for convenience's sake - had not fed her false information somehow, she wondered how much of her original plan was salvageable.

Instead of obtaining an army of useful zombies under the control of her underlings, she had tied up much of her power in maintaining control over the collective consciousness of an undead swarm, most of whose members were utterly useless outside the water.

Simply releasing the spirit was obviously out of the question. Was the undead control spell at least working properly on it? She prodded the mass of rebellious hatred, instructing it to move a few of the zombie fishes sideways.

Outside the dome, a few of the closer corpses started moving their fins sluggishly and swimming in the indicated direction. While lying sideways in the water.

She resisted the urge to sigh and opted to concentrate on the fact that yes, she could probably work around this. Now she only needed to somehow prevent the spirit from slipping its leash the moment she got tired and needed to sleep.

Last edited: Aug 26, 2016

The Flopping Dead

Originally on 2015-12-18T21:35:00

A tide of undead animals poured from the portal's orange glow into the empty entrance hall of Ami's dungeon. The zombies crawled, slithered, and flopped towards a square opening in the ground, proceeding down the ramp in a less than orderly fashion.

On both sides of the procession, newly-repaired reaperbots stood guard, staying as close to the walls and as far away from the wriggling, smelly carpet as possible.

Through a thick glass window high up in the ceiling, Cathy grimaced at the new arrivals "Ugh. We'll have to clean the entire room later. And all the reaperbots too. Burning everything sounds good to me."

Near the front of the smelly, shambling horde, a walrus pulled its rotting body forward. With each ungainly bound, lose skin hanging off its frame whipped around, slapping the creatures next to it. The monster pushed its way through the surrounding zombies, crunching a crab under its flipper without even noticing. Smears and flattened remains stained the formerly clean tiles in its wake. Finally, it disappeared into the hole, speeding up as it skidded down the steep ramp.

The swordswoman winced when she heard a loud, wet thumping noise from below. "Eww." She placed her hands on her hips and turned towards Ami, who was watching the proceedings through a different window. "Are you sure you are feeling all right? Not hearing voices or feeling the strange urge to, oh, convert people into your undead minions?"

Ami looked at her across the observation spot, mildly irritated by the nagging. It wasn't as if she was particularly happy about having the horrid things in her dungeon, either. "Cathy, I'm not under the influence of Crowned Death," she stated with conviction.

"Well, excuse me for feeling a little concerned when you return from your trip with your chief warlock unconscious, a horde of zombies on your heels, and that thing trailing you like a shadow," Cathy said, narrowing her eyes at the spirit hovering a few steps to Ami's left.

The creature had taken on a visible form and looked like a tall, crowned skeleton made of black fire. Hundreds of chains hung off its arms and chest, forming a kind of indistinct robe that moved like smoke. The ends of the chains faded into invisibility, so it was hard to judge how far the spirit could lash out with them if it felt the inclination.

Cathy obviously didn't take any chances and stayed on the opposite site of the room.

"The spirit is completely under my control," Ami assured the blonde, "and since I want it to stay that way, I'm not going to weaken its magical bonds even a little by letting it get farther away from me."

"All right, but are you absolutely, positively sure that having it so close to it is safe?"

Ami nodded absently, busy with construction work in a different part of the dungeon. "I would assume so. At least, having it out here has to be safer than having it stuck in my head." She was rather happy about figuring out how to force the spirit to manifest. It would give her a target to aim at if it ever got free.

"In your head?" Cathy threw her hands up in the air. "That's it, I'm getting Snyder to poke you with some Light magic to clean-"

"NO!" Ami took a quick step back and shook her head violently at the thought of having to endure the repulsive sensation.

"Now that's a reassuring reaction," Cathy stated, crossing her arms. Despite the sarcasm, a hint of worry had crept into her voice.

Ami hurried to clarify the problem. "Look, I need to concentrate to keep the spirit subjugated, and Snyder's magic would be too distracting." Which was putting things mildly. "Besides, you know that I was planning to return with a bunch of controlled zombies."

"That burning ghost wasn't part of the plan! You have already admitted that it's hard to control, and I'm suspecting that you are understating the difficulty. Just look at your eyes, they are glowing bright enough to read by." Cathy took a deep breath. "That thing is terrifying, and I don't understand why you don't just get rid of it."

"That's not as easy as it sounds. Now that it's in one piece, it reintegrates the power released when I kill a body."

Cathy frowned. "Aren't you supposed to have complete control over it?"

"I do, but I can't control its automatic process any better than you can control the function of your liver," Ami pointed out quite reasonably.

"So what are you going to do about it?"

"I still need it to maintain control over the zombies," Ami pointed out the obvious. "Once I have no more use for it, I'll send it into a temple of the Light."

"I am now trying to imagine the expression on the priests' faces when that thing walks in." Cathy chuckled a little, mollified. "All right, but I still have no idea what you want with that batch of rotten seafood down below."

"Well, I have an idea for getting some use out of the zombies," Ami said.

"Oh, yes, they look so very useful," the swordswoman said, her voice dripping with exasperation. "All right, I can almost see how the crocodiles and seals and even the turtles could, maybe, make the dwarfs hesitate, but the vast majority..." she gestured towards the window.

Below, an undead fish slipped off the back of the alligator it had ridden in on. With a powerful slap of its tail fin, it catapulted itself into the air. Metal clanged as it smacked against the chest of a reaperbot and flopped onto the floor. Additional strikes of its fin only managed to make it bounce in random directions.

"I rest my case."

Ami could certainly see why Cathy seemed underwhelmed by their combat potential. "Ah, but I don't intend on having them fight," she replied.

Gleaming new knives, tongs, and pliers hung from the brick walls, competing for space with chains and manacles. Below them, hot coals glowed within tall, goblet-shaped metal basins. Spaced evenly along the walls, they cast the room in a reddish light.

A woman with her hair tied back in an oiled braid stirred the embers with an iron rod, heating the tool to incandescence. She didn't seem to mind that she was risking severe burns, as her form-fitting black leather outfit left generous amounts of skin unprotected. Only her face was well fully covered by a long-beaked plague doctor's mask that fended off the stench of carrion permeating the air.

Other dark mistresses dressed in a similar way moved with purpose between racks, chairs with spike-covered seats, and similar torture devices. Their sadistic giggles filled the air, occasionally drowned out by the moans of their victims.

Whether or not the zombies were moaning because of their torturers' efforts remained unclear.

One of the dark mistresses in particular was not getting a sound out of the targets of her ministrations. The crabs and lobsters she was lowering into boiling oil simply didn't have the capacity to make noises other than the cracking and hissing of their flesh.

In contrast, one of her colleagues a few racks to the left was coaxing strangled gasps from the seal zombie she had strapped to a wheel. When she caressed it with the arcs of lightning flowing from her fingers, its muscles twitched, contracted and drove air through the animal's throat. She was also rapidly searing away her victim's remaining flesh, so her chosen method would not be working for much longer.

She would get a replacement soon, as an imp was already cranking a small winch and raising a squirming bag filled with more undead from the dark pit in the centre of the room.

An ice golem sat at a desk near the exit, the glow of her eyes tinted violet from passing through her visor. Ami was taking notes on the proceedings, hoping to find a pattern to the results that made sense. Her sense of touch being off made typing slightly harder, but that drawback was well worth it in exchange for not having to perceive the smell of decay and burnt rotting flesh.

Her involuntary assistant for the experiments was hovering to her left. The spirit remained motionless, its form partially intersecting one of the burning basins without negative effects.

She wasn't surprised, since the thing didn't seem to interact with physical objects. It had only reacted once, when she had poked it with her adamantine dagger. The spirit had been flung away by the soft stab as if it weighted nothing at all. While satisfying to watch, that didn't exactly provide her with a means to contain the creature.

Through her awareness of the spirit, she noticed it feeling a brief pricking sensation, not unlike a hair being pulled out.

She recognised the sensation, having felt it a few times before. A piece of the creature's power had been plucked away from it. She sat up straighter, waiting for one of the dark mistress to approach and show off her success.

"Your Majesty, I have another one," one of the women called out, pushing up her mask so that her grinning face was visible. She turned and looked over her shoulder at something on the ground. "Hurry up, you!"

A large turtle that was missing its lower jaw shuffled after the woman as she walked towards the desk.

Ami blinked, her eyebrows rising as she stared at the impossible sight of the zombie with a minion bond. "H-how did you manage that? I know for a fact that they can't feel pain!"

In fact, the spirit didn't even notice damage to its bodies that wasn't crippling or fatal. Even the latter only registered as discomfort on the level of a mild itch. It was the only reason why Ami consider torturing the undead creatures to be a moral grey area at worst.

If she had been wrong about that, then- well, she still wouldn't be guilty of anything more evil than animal cruelty, she comforted herself. Anxiously, she waited for her employee's explanation.

"Yes, I had to get creative," the woman laughed, leaning forward and putting her elbows on Ami's desk. "Such a challenge can be quite satisfying, if you know what I mean," she added in a throaty voice, almost shoving her chest in the seated girl's face.

To Ami's chagrin, the dark mistresses weren't following the trend of conjured cloaks, unlike the rest of the magic users in her employ. Their usual outfits already had little to fear from her dungeon's corruption.

"So what did you do?" she asked as she backed away from the awkward invasion of her personal space.

"Well, since pain wasn't working, I was going for full immersion in things opposed to the death god's sphere of influence," the mistress began.

Extrapolating from the themes of her dungeon's corruption, Ami already had an inkling of where this was going. "Continue," she said with a sinking feeling.

"First, I jabbed long needles deep into the zombie's flesh, implanting various kinds of plant seeds. Then, I seeded every inch of its body with mushroom spores. After forcing it to swallow a few handfuls of white, lively maggots, I placed it in a box full of randy fruit flies looking for a mate," the woman reported, almost purring. "And then I spoke blasphemous words talking about the pleasures of pen-"

"Uh, yes, I get it," Ami interrupted quickly, unwilling to listen to the sordid details. "I can see how that would be a torment to a creature of death." She couldn't help feel impressed by the effort the dark mistress had put into making the zombie miserable. Impressed and horrified. "This is certainly, um, outstanding work, and I commend your dedication, but, well, you needn't have gone through all that trouble."

"Oh, it was no trouble at all," the dark mistress said. "I so enjoyed every little bit of progress."

Had the woman leaned in even closer? Ami squirmed on her seat, inching a little further away. "Still, I have no use for converted zombies. They are unhygienic, smelly, and leave pieces behind when they move." She pointed at the undead turtle that had almost reached them by now. "Please take it back and," her voice lowered as she almost stumbled over the words "torture it to death properly."

"Of course, Empress. If I may, it's a real honour to have you down here with us," the dark mistress continued, giving no indication that she was about to move away. "We are both amazed and curious about your work." She indicated Isolda, who was working in the corner the furthest away from Ami.

At the reminded, she grew aware of the weight of the enchanted amulet hanging from her neck, but she managed not to look down at it. "That's quite flattering, but could you-"

"We would be greatly honoured by a demonstration of your skill. I, for one, would also relish some more personal lessons directly underneath you."

Ami barely stopped herself from disappearing on the spot. She was smart enough to recognise double entendres, not that the leather-clad woman's tone and body language were hard to misunderstand. Being not interested at all in the offer, Ami felt completely embarrassed by the aggressive flirtation. Somehow, she managed to get the words "Back. To. Work." out without stammering.

The dark mistress looked disappointed as she nodded. "Of course, your Majesty."

When she left, Ami let out a sigh of relief and shook her head. She had barely enough time to move her chair back closer to her desk before another female silhouette approached.

The woman pointed her right thumb at the pale white glow that floated above her bare shoulder. "I got this one from some fish," she said in a bored voice. "Any better than the last?"

On closer inspection, the almost transparent apparition swimming through the air had indeed the stream-lined shape of a fish. To be more precise, it was the the front half of a fish. Everything behind the main fins dissolved into a trail of indistinct mist.

Ami inspected the ghost through her visor before standing up and softly flicking her finger through the pale shape.

The ghost popped like a soap bubble, leaving nothing but a cold breeze behind.

"I'm afraid it's still not strong enough," she replied to the question. "At least, this latest result confirms that the size of the zombie's body affects the ghost that results from its death." She wasn't actually sure that the destruction of an undead creature was a real death, but at least her torture chamber considered it to be one.

Since the evil magic inherent in the room's design probably wasn't meant to turn one kind of undead into another, the ghosts produced so far were decidedly substandard. The chamber wasn't working very well without agony to catalyse the victim's transformation into a ghost, and getting it to properly recognise the moment of a zombie's "death" and trigger the process also remained more art than science.

Ami suspected that success would be impossible without the spirit's forced cooperation. By ordering it to keep the part of itself that was animating a body together for as long as possible, she gave the torture chamber enough time to bind the emulated soul and turn it into an angry ghost. In theory.

In practice, Ami wasn't sure she was really creating animal ghosts. It was possible that she was merely ripping parts of the spirit off and turning them into mini-spirits bound to her direct control. Still, as long as the individual pieces remained sub-sapient, the difference was mainly academic.

Or at least it would be once she had refined the process.

"Oh well, I guess back to work then," the dark mistress said, pulling Ami out of her thoughts. "I'd honestly prefer to be working on a few of the prisoners," she stated.

"You have your orders," Ami answered sharply, feeling sickened as she imagined a dwarf instead of a zombie on one of the spiky torture devices. She wished she didn't have to interact with the dark mistresses, as she found everything about them repulsive.

In the back of the room, boiling oil fountained upwards as one of the crabs within burst apart. It failed to produce a ghost.

Right, back to optimisation. The main problem, according to her partial model of the process, was the lack of density of spirit-stuff within the undead bodies. This, at least, was something she could easily adjust. "Rabixtrel, continue the extermination," she mentally ordered her horned reaper.

The red-scaled demon was currently on the Avatar Islands , patrolling the shore and gathering small, beached zombies into a large barrel. At her command, he perked up and raced over to a a huge cylinder-shaped device with a long lever sticking horizontally out from one side.

In principle, the metal construction was a mill of the kind usually turned by draft animals walking around it. Of course, Rabixtrel wasn't using it to grind grains. He lifted his barrel up over his shoulder and dumped its smelly, writhing content into the funnel above the grinder. Dust clouds fountained around his hooves as he sprinted over to the lever in his eagerness to start turning the zombies into mincemeat.

Ami was glad the reaper didn't mind destroying them in an impersonal, industrial fashion. She needed the useless bodies destroyed as quickly as possible so the concentration of the spirit's power within the remaining ones increased.

Since she didn't have the logistics to transport masses of aquatic undead, it had been trivially simple to decide which ones she would keep. She had simply ordered all of them to climb on land. The ones that got stuck on the beach were automatically disqualified.

It meant that the prison-pits below her torture chamber were now mostly filled with amphibious creatures such as turtles, walruses, crabs, alligators, newts, giant frogs, and even squids.

As Rabixtrel eliminated more of the leftovers, the power readings of the zombies inside the chamber slowly changed.

Another dark mistress was bringing her a ghost. This one had a shark's face and was large enough to swallow someone's head whole.

Ami briefly wondered how a shark had even managed to get here. The undead didn't need to breathe, so she supposed it wasn't impossible for a strong enough fish to slither across the ground like a stiff snake, but it couldn't have been easy. In any case, this ghost looked more promising than the previous ones.

As the mist-like head of the animal approached, the air went noticeably colder.

Ami smiled at the dark mistress. "Good work. This one has the kind of presence I was looking for. Leave it here with me, please."

"Of course, Empress." the woman bowed and left, leaving the fish hovering above Ami's desk.

The young Keeper could already tell that the being counted as one of her minions, but to be absolutely certain, she ordered the spirit to make the ghost shark turn around.

The tooth-filled maw kept stubbornly facing her, and she felt a pulse of intensified loathing from the minion of Crowned Death.

With her curiosity satisfied, the turned to a dark corner. "Golga, please come here."

In the shadows, a statue-still silhouette wrapped in a black cloak suddenly moved. It slid closer without making a sound, moving into the light of the glowing coals. Pale skin shone almost red and fangs poked out over bloodless lips as the vampire revealed herself. "Your Majesty?"

She pointed at the tooth-filled face of the animal ghost. "Do your ghost-wrangling techniques work on it?"

Golga's blood-coloured eyes flashed once, and she made a beckoning gesture with her arm. The rest of her body remained still like a corpse.

The ghost shark approached the vampire and started to circle her. At one point, in floated over to a rack, took one of its chains into its mouth, pulled on it, and then returned to Golga.

"It responds to my orders about as well as Zarekos' minions did, as long as I can picture its task properly," the vampire reported. "It does not understand orders that I cannot show it."

"That's good to know," Ami nodded. When she had accepted the vampires into her service, she hadn't expected their expertise at ghost handling to turn out useful. "I will be putting you in charge of commanding a number of the new ghosts," she decided.

"Of course, your Majesty." Golga smiled, which didn't make her look any livelier.

"Be aware that I will hold you responsible for anything the ghosts do wrong under your command," Ami warned, trying to sound intimidating. She didn't dare deploy them on their own, given their lack of intelligence, so their handler needed to follow her orders to the letter.

Golga bowed. "I would not have expected anything different. Zarekos had the same policy."

Ami felt a brief moment of doubt. Should she be doing things the same way as another Keeper? In this particular case, she probably didn't need to worry. Trying to maintain discipline was not inherently evil. "Well, I'm glad I won't have to explain further, then." Mainly because she didn't have to specify the consequences for failure. "Oh, and one more thing, Golga."

"Yes?"

She shifted her view to the chamber where cloaked figures stood around pumpkin-sized eyeballs on stalks. "I need someone who can handle the scavenger room with subtlety. Send me the best expert of your group."

"It shall be done." Golga bowed again and slid back into the darkness, recognising the dismissal.

Water dripped in irregular intervals from the ceiling of the warm, humid prison. A few of the drops landed in the shallow drain running down the length of the corridor, with louder splashes. The rest splattered onto the floor tiles and made them slippery, occasionally providing entertainment for the dwarven prisoners at the expense of the patrolling goblins.

Confined within separate and dry cells, the dwarfs had nothing to fear from the drizzle. Nevertheless, they did not look particularly amused at the moment. Most of them were wearing only in whatever they had been wearing underneath their armour, and neither the battle nor the dungeon's corruption had been kind to their outfits. Nevertheless, they stood right in front of the bars, watching the confrontation taking place a few empty cells further down the corridor.

"...besides, you are not even a real princess!" a loud, female shout echoed off the prison's damp walls.

"I'm too! I am the heiress to an empire, you potato-nosed snob!" Tiger's voice shouted back. She grabbed the bars of the dwarf's cells, the metal ringing from the impact. "That trumps whatever shabby little fief you are a princess of!"

"Shabby little-" the dwarf woman went as red as her hair red and looked as if she would explode. With visible effort, she forced down her anger and crossed her arms. "Right now, you are just some random monster with no title at all," she said, staring smugly at the youma. "Which makes you my social inferior. Commoner."

The two goblins flanking Tiger glared at the insolent prisoner, and one of them let out an angry growl. The other took a step forward, stomping his boot in the drain and sending a spray of tepid water in the dwarf's direction.

Tiger shot him a glare, and he froze, hung his head, and returned to his place at the orange-skinned girl's side.

"Oh, at least you have trained your pets well. Or was that someone else, since you don't really look that competent?" the imprisoned dwarf asked.

"You should really watch your tongue," Tiger said, frowning at the woman.

"Or what?" the prisoner challenged.

In the cell across the hallway from her, another dwarf shook his head silently, his beard whipping left and right as he put both hands over his mouth.

The intended target of his mimed advice never noticed it, as she kept her gaze firmly on Tiger. "Are you going to threaten me with dragging me off to the same fate as my valiant warriors?"

A number of nearby cells were open, still showing signs of recent occupation.

"Why would I threaten you with something that's going to happen soonish anyway?" Tiger asked, an ugly grin appearing on her face when the dwarf woman's pupils shrank in sudden fright.

"You will not break me, demon!" the dwarf stated, scowling.

"Well, yes, obviously," Tiger said cheerfully.

"You- what?" The princess' defiant stance wavered at the admission.

"If you really want to know what happened to those other dwarfs," the youma said, pointing at the empty cells, "I can tell you." She leaned in as if she was about to divulge a great secret. "The truth is that my sister, the Empress, is using them to refine her interrogation techniques."

The dwarf's face went first slack, then pale, and finally settled on furious.

"Tiger, that is quite enough," Ami intruded on the squabble with a telepathic message. "I am ready to see her now, please move away from the cell."

"Hah, and just now she told me she's about to take you away!" Tiger added as a parting shot, grinning as she turned to leave. A wave of her hand, and the goblin guards hurried after her.

Ami was displeased by Tiger's taunting of the prisoner. Insinuating that the woman was about to be tortured definitely went too far even if she had been needlessly antagonistic.

Four orcs turned the corned and entered the hallway, approaching the cell.

Ami could have used Keeper transport to bring the prisoner to her throne room instantly, but Snyder had suggested that she avoid reminding the dwarfs about her Keeper status as much as possible. Moving the prisoners in a way that resembled their own customs would make them feel as if they were meeting a legitimate ruler, rather than a Keeper.

The team of orcs took position around the cell with practised ease, two holding their clubs at the ready while a third hung back with a crossbow. The fourth unlocked the door and stepped aside to let his armed companions enter.

"You filthy savages! Don't you dare lay a hand on me!" the prisoner shouted, backing away against the wall of her cell.

The two orcs approached, unimpressed by the woman's raised fists.

"The Empress is watching," one of them spoke in a gravelly voice. "You can either come quietly or come twitching and mildly scorched."

The princess hesitated for a moment, cobalt eyes narrowed as she considered her options. Finally, she dropped her combat stance and stood ramrod straight. "Fine. Let none say that I did not meet my fate with dignity."

"Blindfold," the orc who had threatened her commanded, unimpressed.

As the pink-skinned soldiers readied the dwarf for transport, Ami took the opportunity to inspect her a little more closely in preparation for their impending conversation.

The princess was looking surprisingly good for someone who had been thrown into jail wearing nothing but battle-damaged undergarments. One of the other dwarfs had thrown her an shirt that was much larger than her own. It went down to just above her knees, and its sleeves had been removed and re-purposed as a sash and a few ribbons. Even without tools, the tailor had somehow managed to adjust the fabric so that even the damage looked like decorative frills.

Amazed, Ami noted that the improvised dress didn't need to fear a comparison with her own. The daring cut even seemed to be making concessions to the effects of her corruption. If dwarven craftsmanship could do this, then a few of their tailors would be able to do a lot about improving her dungeon's clothing situation.

The orcs were leading the blindfolded woman out of her cell now, keeping a loose grip on her upper arms. Not that she needed the guidance, as even blind, she didn't stumble.

Nevertheless, the blindfold gave Ami the opportunity to cast one of the spells she had found in Malleus' dungeon on the princess. It deceived the senses, and the late Keeper had named it 'Turncoat', since he had used it to make enemies attack their allies. Ami had a more benevolent use for it in mind - simulating peer pressure. She needed any advantage she could get if she wanted to convince the woman that the dwarfs should stop their attacks.

Last edited: Aug 26, 2016

Noble Conversations

Originally on 2016-01-27T23:48:00

The orcs released their iron grip on Iden's upper arms, allowing her to stop.

She tensed, listening into the darkness behind the blindfold.

The footsteps of the guards retreated, and her mineral sense reported their metal armours lining up behind her.

Together, the orcs dropped to one knee and lowered their heads.

Iden swallowed. She was in the same room as the dark empress. Was it a torture chamber? She sniffed the air, almost sick with worry.

No blood. The air smelt humid, but with a hint of smoke.

Torches? Braziers? A basin filled with red-hot irons? Iden took a long breath and concentrated on suppressing her shivers. She would not besmirch her honour by showing fear in front of the enemy.

"Rise," a young-sounding female voice said from somewhere ahead. It echoed faintly, indicating that the room was large and open.

The dark empress herself? Iden didn't find the voice intimidating. She shook her head - those were dangerous thoughts when dealing with a Keeper.

"Captain Lugot, you and your squad may leave after taking off her blindfold," the voice continued.

One of the shapes behind Iden raised its metal gauntlet towards its helmet, saluting. The collection of metal pieces moved on to approach her from behind. A moment later, the knot of her blindfold came loose, and the piece of dark cloth fell off.

Iden took a blind step away from the orc, unable to see in the sudden brightness. Squinting, she spotted two braziers burning at the end of a long hall. Between them, gilded stairs drew her gaze upwards.

On a throne concealed by the glare, two spots of crimson glowed at head-height.

Iden froze as if she had spotted a poisonous snake. Not daring to look away from the figure on the throne, she wished her eyes would adapt to the light faster. Every gesture, every expression and every twitch of the enemy's face could prove vital to her continued survival. She didn't know what the Keeper wanted from her yet, but she was determined not to give it to her.

Behind her, the orc bellowed "Dwarf, you are in the presence of her Imperial Majesty Sailor Mercury, Empress of the Avatar Islands! Introduce yourself!"

She twitched at the volume and reflexively stood straight as she processed his words. Her mouth was already opening before she managed to remind herself that Mercury was foreign nobility, and a Keeper to boot.

Nevertheless, her title was real and demanded a minimum of courtesy and respect.

Reluctantly, she inclined her head. "Iden Sodnil," she said, proud to keep her voice unwavering, "second daughter of Baron Sodnil."

The indistinct silhouette of the dark empress nodded once. "Welcome. You are the first dwarven leader I have the opportunity to hold a civil conversation with," she said.

That was a distinction Iden could have lived without. At least, she could comfort herself with the knowledge that none of her fellow nobles had been captured.

The two red glows in Mercury's face narrowed. "Of course, I would have preferred someone who wasn't involved in slaughtering the helpless wounded," she continued in a cold voice.

Iden didn't flinch, but it was a near thing. Then, she got angry at the hypocrisy of a Keeper complaining about unsavoury combat tactics.

After Mercury's revelation, displeased muttering came from - above?

She allowed herself a brief look around while trying to come up with an answer that wouldn't get her killed or tortured in a fit of pique. Right now, she couldn't see the empress well enough to discern her body language anyway.

There were balconies to the left and right on the hall, with minions on top. Shoddy architecture in comparison with dwarven work, held up by tasteless pillars. Below, in the shadows, skulked more trolls and orcs and even a few dwarfs.

Her heart skipped a beat, and it took all of her hard-earned discipline to not gape like some common yokel. Those, those rotten traitors! How dare they? Didn't they remember- no. She couldn't get worked up now. The dark empress was waiting for an answer.

She could almost feel the expectant gazes of the audience on her, urging her on. "I do not have to justify my tactical decisions to the enemy," she snapped, unable to contain her anger.

The words hung in the room, which fell silent.

Realising just how confrontational that had sounded, she quickly added "With all due respect."

Mercury's scowl deepened.

Iden almost regretted being able to see her properly now. "However, if I had to justify my actions, then I would point out that leaving active enemies in my back would have been suicidal. Especially with no way to secure prisoners."

Mercury's lips pressed closer together, forming a thin line. One of her hands tightened its grip on the armrest of her throne briefly before relaxing.

Signs of barely-restrained anger, Iden suspected. Of course, the dark empress was an evil mastermind and could be an accomplished actress. Then again, she was also an upstart commoner raised to the ranks of nobility. She wouldn't have had a proper education, so she might be betraying her real emotions here.

The brighter red glow in Mercury's eyes hinted at the latter possibility. "You should not have attacked, then," the girl said, her voice no longer calm.

Iden simply couldn't stop herself. "Neither should you," she quipped, a hint of smugness in her voice. Inwardly, she cringed. Was she actually trying to goad the Keeper into killing her? While a good way to avoid torture, suicide was shameful cowardice.

Mercury blinked, perhaps taken aback by Iden's boldness.

Iden secretly scoffed at the reaction, which she would have expected from a mere commoner. It fit with Mercury's general appearance. Her dress was of similar quality to what the daughter of a mildly successful merchant would wear - before the guards dragged her away for indecent exposure. That Keeper was insulting proper nobles everywhere by wearing something so scandalously short and clingy in front of her court!

"I did not attack you," Mercury said, some of the heat leaving her voice.

That clinched it for Iden. Only an amateur would be put so easily on the defensive. "You have violated the borders of Nimbadnur," she elaborated. "As a noble sworn to protect this land, I demand that you and your troops withdraw from our territory at once!"

"Impossible," Mercury replied immediately.

Well, it had been worth a try. Being in a position where she had very little to lose was making her feel bolder.

"However, I am not the one who is to blame for the current situation," the dark empress continued, her voice accusatory. "By your own laws, I should have been listened to when I asked to negotiate. It is my right as an empress."

"Those laws weren't written with Keepers in mind," Iden stated the obvious.

"Why would that change anything?" the dark empress asked. She didn't sound angry, merely curious. Curious and eager.

Iden's hackles rose. If she wasn't completely wrong, then Mercury was about to spring some kind of rhetorical trap on her. Obviously, she couldn't trust a word the enemy said. No matter what, she wouldn't betray her country! "Anyone who serves a Keeper is considered insane. Someone like that is not entitled to the usual privileges of nobility," she summarised the relevant parts she remembered.

"Anyone serving Keepers. Your laws make no provisions for nobles who are Keepers. I had people research this issue," the dark empress stated confidently.

If that was all that Mercury was betting on, then Iden had nothing to fear. "Are you implying that Keepers aren't inherently self-serving?"

If the dark empress was offended, she didn't show it. A faint smile played around her lips. "Ah, but answer me a simple question. Does or doesn't your law derive its legitimacy from the Light?"

"It does," she answered after a brief moment of hesitation. It was a simple, undeniable fact.

"Now, did or didn't the Light gods know that I was a Keeper when they made me the Empress of the Avatar Islands?"

Iden's thoughts ground to a halt. She could already see where the dark empress was going with this, and she didn't like the direction at all. "They did," she grumbled.

Mercury smiled. "And would the Light gods knowingly bestow a noble title on someone who wasn't fit to rule?"

"They clearly did," Iden thought rebelliously. On some level, Mercury herself had to be aware of this, since she wasn't wearing a proper crown - merely a tiara with a large sapphire set in its centre. Was some last shred of decency stopping her from donning all of the trappings of the title she didn't deserve? "I do not presume to understand the motivations behind the actions of the gods," she answered diplomatically.

"Well then, do you think that your laws are more important than the wishes of the Light, from whom they derive their legitimacy?" Mercury insisted.

Dangerous terrain. Iden clenched her teeth and stared straight ahead. She didn't have an acceptable reply. Obviously, the law wasn't above the will of the gods. On the other hand, she couldn't state in good conscience that the Light really wanted for Mercury to be an empress.

"Please answer the question," the dark empress demanded when the silence stretched.

Unfortunately, Mercury was within her rights to expect an answer. Tradition demanded that she respect fellow nobles, especially those of higher rank. Even if they were foreign and evil. On the other hand, the law mandated that Keepers had to be destroyed, and any cooperation with them was forbidden.

Iden wondered if she should escape the situation by dashing forward, grabbing one of the braziers, and bashing the Keeper's head in. She dismissed that idea a split-second after considering it. Even if she wasn't tackled on the way or incinerated by foul magic, the dark empress could reportedly defeat a horned reaper in hand-to-hand combat. Still, a quick death might be better than whatever the Keeper had in store for her.

The gazes of the other dwarfs bored into her back, silent and disapproving.

Iden wasn't keen on dying, and she was embarrassing herself with her inability to answer. "The Light has more authority, but They would have taken action with the expectation that we will keep following our laws," she spoke.

The dark empress smiled. "Well, then there is no problem. Your laws don't cover my specific situation, and your gods have expressed their will on this issue. I am a noble, and you would have to abide by any agreements I made with your leaders."

Iden gritted her teeth so hard she feared she would chip them. Looking at the floor, she said "I cannot spot the flaw in your argumentation," she admitted in defeat. Was this how Mercury had started grinding down the resolve of the other dwarfs? Her presence was a lot more intimidating when she couldn't simply be dismissed as an insane maniac with no right to rule.

"Thank you. With that out of the way, I think you would be of sufficient rank to make yourself heard if I used you as a go-between for negotiations?" Mercury asked, suddenly all business.

"What is there to negotiate?" she asked in surprise.

"Ceasefires, cessation of hostilities and hostage exchanges, to start with."

"That's not going to happen. None of it," she said with conviction, staring straight into Mercury's eyes. Keeper Bartholomeus - cursed be his name - had demonstrated only fifteen years ago how much harm a Keeper who wasn't stopped quickly could do. "Your continued presence in our lands is intolerable."

The disappointment creeping on Mercury's face did much to lift Iden's mood.

"What about the prisoners I took during the assault? I can't imagine that you don't want them back," the Empress asked, sounding almost pleading.

Iden thought about her father, who was probably worrying about her being tortured right now. Her throat constricting as she said "There's nothing to be gained from ransoming hostages from a Keeper. We either free them or bury them," she explained. It painted a bleak picture of her own future, she realised.

"That's horrible!" the dark empress exclaimed and shifted on her throne uneasily.

Who was she trying to kid? "Keepers are even more horrible! It's the only sane approach to take!"

Mercury sighed and lowered her head. "You have given me much to think about. For the moment, you are dismissed."

An instant later, Iden found herself back in a cell, though it was a more comfortable one than her previous one.

Six burning candles decorated the small shrine to the Light travelling through the tunnel, riding on a wheelbarrow. A dwarven priest was pushing the vehicle forwards at a steady pace, carefully keeping the shrine from scraping against the roughly hewn walls.

Behind him, two guards in full plate armour marched in lock-step, carrying heavy coils of warding chain. A similar pair moved at the end of the procession, following the palanquin of a white-haired wizard holding a crystal ball within his shaky grasp.

In the middle of all these precautions, the commanders of the forces besieging Whitemountain were walking alongside a rolling map table.

"We have to rescue the hostages right now," a bald dwarf with a rusty red beard said. "Those large torture chambers she built don't leave us much of a choice, and-"

Baron Lolok raised his hand. "Baron Sodnil, I understand that you want to save your daughter, but caution-"

Sodnil glared at him so fiercely that the other man swallowed.

Count Ornish sympathised with the red-bearded baron's anger. He didn't want to imagine what it would feel like if one of his own children was about to be tortured by a Keeper.

"This isn't only about Iden!" Sodnil said loudly, his brow furrowed. "This isn't even only about our men captured by that monster!" He slammed his palm onto one of the floor plans of the dungeon. "Have you forgotten all about her other hostages?"

Ornish recognised the map as one of the dungeon's lower layers, where the human prisoners of the dark empress dwelt. He'd seen them briefly in the crystal ball and pitied them. Children and teenagers clad in barely decent rags, forced to live in a den of evil and immorality. Without enough adults to guide them on the right path, they had little hopes of resisting the Keeper's corrupting influence. "You believe she will no longer be satisfied with turning them to her side slowly?"

Baron Sodnil nodded. "Yes, my liege. She needs troops, therefore she will not ignore such a resource!"

"Now wait a moment," the third baron objected. Zonbal was a heavily-built dwarf whose beard resembled the puffy cheeks of a hamster. "That's not a conclusion we should jump to lightly. Yes, she tried to deceive us about getting orc support," he inclined his head briefly towards the wizard with his crystal ball, "but that doesn't mean her dungeon is undermanned right now!"

"Let's see," Sodnil said, raising his hand. "She tried to talk us into not attacking, she took prisoners rather than killing our soldiers, she built torture chambers, she tried to deceive us about her troop strength, and she is fortifying her position. With each point, he had raised one finger. "The conclusion is clear: she is not ready for an all-out assault. If we use all of our troops this time-"

"We are much weaker than we started out, too!" Zonbal interrupted, raising his voice. "The men we had to evacuate through the hero gate are still at the capital, and so is the Avatar!"

"Great help that he was," Lolok muttered into his beard, crossing his arms.

Count Ornish weighted the arguments. If he gave up on maintaining a secure perimeter, he could mount an assault with one and a half again as many soldiers as the first one. By focusing on reaching the hostages, rather than generalised demolition, he should be able to rescue them and then beat a hasty retreat. "I am inclined to side with Baron Sodnil here," he said. "Inaction will not serve us."

"But my liege!" Zonbal said, his face pale. "It would be wiser to wait for the Duke's reinforcements! The dark empress may deploy more lethal measures if we press her too hard!"

"Coward," Sodnil shouted. "We will be forced to fight our own people if we wait a few days! Do you want that?"

Zonbal ignored him and continued pleading with Count Ornish. "It's too dangerous! What about the recent quakes?" He moved his index finger over a map that showed the surface. The digit hovered briefly over the red-circled epicentres located around the dungeon.

Ornish turned is head towards the wizard, who was resting on his pillows.

"Sorry, it's dark. Can't see a thing," the elderly dwarf said, waving his hand over the crystal ball.

"Perhaps I can shed some light on this," Baron Lolok said. "I took the liberty of sending some scouts to take a closer look."

"Dangerous," Zonbal commented, scratching his chin.

"It's neutral territory, the risks were minimal," Lolok contradicted.

"Well, what did they find?" Baron Sodnil asked impatiently.

"Zones where the underground has been smashed into rubble by some kind of magic. Basically, we have to dig through a zone of loose rock to get into the dungeon."

Count Ornish scoffed. "Is that all? It sounds like something our engineers can handle easily."

Lolok shrugged. "It would pose a significant obstacle to imps and lesser miners," he said. "The dark empress may not be fully aware of our capabilities."

Ornish smiled. "That would be a welcome advantage," he thought out loud. "If we could surprise her by attacking from a direction she isn't expecting..."

Baron Zonbal sighed and lowered his head in defeat.

A new sound could be heard over the synchronised footsteps of the marching soldiers. Someone was running towards the group, only to be stopped by the rearmost guards.

"Quick, let me through," the new arrival said as he caught his breath. With his body concealed underneath a cloak that shifted colours to adapt to its environment, it looked as if his head was floating. "I have urgent news for the Lords!"

"Let him pass," Ornish ordered, both curious and worried. Surprises, in his experience, were rarely a good thing during war.

"Ghosts," the scout said between panting breaths. "In the fissures!"

"Ghosts?" Sodnil said incredulously, raising an eyebrow. "Are you sure? Everyone knows about her feud with the dark god of the undead."

"One of them bit my partner," the scout said flatly, shooting the baron a dark look.

Ornish didn't like where this was going. "Explain. Where did you spot the ghosts?"

The scout "River. Near the quake-damaged areas. Azok - that's my partner - wanted to check out a fissure near the waterline."

Someone arrived with a full mug and proffered it to the tired dwarf.

He grabbed it and chugged it down in one go. "Ah, that's better." He blinked at the waiting nobles. "Right. So Azok wanted to check how much water was draining into the underground, but he slipped. Water was pretty deep there. Gave me a good fright when he went under. Not as much as the ghost, though."

"What ghost?" Baron Sodnil interrupted.

Ornish shot him a glare and raised his hand in a shushing motion.

"The one attached to his leg when I pulled him out," the scout said, shivering. "Looked horrible. Frozen blood on its fangs, mist drifting from its face. Anyway, Azok was screaming and thrashing, so I poked the thing with my sword. It let go, thank the Light, but then more started popping out of the water like mushrooms. We ran. Had to carry him half the way."

"Good work, soldier," Count Ornish complimented the exhausted man. "Go take a rest and have another drink. I'll send someone to take a more detailed report later."

"Thank you, my Liege." The scout bowed deeply and departed, at a much more sedate pace than he had come.

The assembled nobles looked at each other as they digested the new information.

"So. Ghosts," Count Ornish began. "Thoughts?"

"How?" Baron Sodnil asked, his voice shrill. "It should be impossible, the god of the undead hates her!"

Baron Lolok shrugged. "Nevertheless, there they are. Hmm." His haggard features grew thoughtful. "No bones nor bodies for us to sense. They'd be perfect for an ambush."

"Trap." Zonbal stated, slamming his fist into his palm. "She wants us to attack! The torture chambers, the fake reinforcements - it's all part of her plan to make us charge in recklessly!"

Count Ornish felt his hackles rise. Zonbal's words made too much sense. He had been about to lead his men straight to their doom.

The vampire stood transfixed, unable to tear his gaze from the expanding puddle of blood on the floor of Ami's lab.

"Believe me, you don't want any of that," Tiger commented with a smirk, jolting the undead monster from his stupor.

He turned to look at the youma in confusion, his expression urging her to elaborate.

Ami cleared her throat, reminding him of her presence. "I believe you were here to report on something?"

The black-robed figure jerked upright, the tip of his tongue darting back into his mouth. "Yes, your Majesty, please forgive my lapse of attention. Golga informs me that the ghosts have all been returned to their lair, without further incidents. Do you have additional orders that require my particular skills?"

"No, I am satisfied with your current achievements," she replied. "And please stop staring at the experiment."

Tiger snickered.

"Apologies, your Majesty." He swivelled to face Ami directly, without moving any of his limbs.

"You did great work luring those scouts to where they were needed," she continued. "Are you certain they won't suspect foul play?"

"Almost completely. I projected only a hint of movement in the corner of an eye here, the warning cry of a disturbed animal there..." The vampire shrugged. "Small nudges, but enough to guide them in the right direction."

"Wait, you can do that with the scavenger room?" Tiger asked.

"It would be a poor tool for corrupting the weak-minded if it couldn't influence them without being blatantly obvious."

Ami nodded slowly, feeling a little uncomfortable. Personally, she had never practised enough with the giant bobbing eyes to send anything more complex than words, so she had to trust in him knowing what he was doing.

"As for your Majesty's own contribution, I don't believe they noticed," the unnaturally still figure continued. "Indeed, under the circumstances, they would have had no time to wonder about why a stone came loose under a foot."

Ami winced. She hadn't enjoyed making the dwarf fall into the cold river in the first place, but him getting bitten by an overly aggressive ghost hadn't been part of the plan. "Oh, and tell Golga that I don't blame her for the bite. That was due to the spirit's interference," she said.

The evil thing was in bad shape from the repeated ghost extractions and more irate than ever. At some point, it had dropped below the threshold of power necessary to maintain sapience, rendering it unable to comprehend complex orders. This gave it more leeway than Ami would have liked.

The vampire's gaze lingered briefly on the floor tile underneath which she had temporarily stored the angry spirit. "She will be relieved to hear that, I'm sure, and I shall inform her forthwith. By your leave?"

"Dismissed," Ami confirmed.

With a last, longing look at the blood on the floor, the creature floated toward the exit.

By now, the puddle had expanded enough that it threatened to touch Tiger's toes.

The youma took a hasty step backwards and turned towards Ami, putting her hands on her hips. "What a mess. I told you to ask Jadeite for help!"

"I couldn't, not for something like this," Ami protested, covering her cheeks with her hands as she shook her head.

"What's the problem? I'm sure he wouldn't mind," Tiger said, her tone turning mischievous. "He might even see something that gives him ideas," she added with a wink.

Ami flushed. "Tiger! D-don't imply improper things like that," she said in a scandalised voice. Turning away from her adopted sister, she pointed at the third occupant of the room. "Can't you fix that instead?"

A bleeding figure that could have been Ami's twin stood in the spotlight, leaking blood from many long gashes in her skin.

Ami's stomach twisted just from looking at the wounds. She focused on the figure's right elbow, where a ragged slit ran almost all the way around the joint. Through the gaping tear in the skin, she could see the blood-smeared ice below.

"It's difficult," Tiger whined.

A small patch of skin flaked off the animated statue and landed in the puddle on the ground, sending ripples through the red liquid.

"J-just dispel it already," Ami instructed, looking away. She was extremely grateful that the disguised golem's face remained serene and expressionless. Glamour could simulate senses, and the statue looked as if it should have been in excruciating pain.

"Fine. This is pretty gross," the youma agreed.

The blood on the floor turned into water, and the ice golem's skin faded away, turning smooth and reflective. Within moments, all of the gashes on her body had filled, leaving her looking none the worse for wear.

"I don't understand why this is so difficult for you," Ami said, honestly puzzled. "You already taught me that corpse decoy glamour. Shouldn't this be extremely similar?"

"Asks the girl who isn't able to cast even the simplest glamour without possessing someone and having them demonstrate it over and over again until she can copy it," Tiger answered, visibly satisfied about excelling in an area that Ami was weak in.

Ami clenched her teeth. The fact that Tiger was basically correct stung her pride. Sure, she could go through the motions, shape her magic in the right way and get the expected result, but she had to work by pure rote memory. "It just doesn't make sense to me," she said heatedly.

Tiger patted her on the head. "Well, being the smart big sister that I am, I shall explain the problem. This is something completely different from the corpse since I don't have the luxury of creating something from a blank slate. I need to keep the base alive and working correctly while melding it seamlessly into the glamour. Also, the glamour itself isn't just some dead matter, which- "

"I get it," Ami said, looking at the floor. "My assumptions were wrong and I shouldn't have been too embarrassed to ask Jadeite for help with this."

"True, but I think I've got this now," Tiger said, approaching the golem and putting one finger on her forehead. "If I make the skin stick better to the ice underneath, that should stop it from getting overstretched and tearing. Let's see..."

With a shimmer that looked like heat haze, the statue's surface turned soft and flesh-coloured. Strands of ice transformed into blue hair, and clear irises gained a shade of blue that Ami used to see in the mirror. The result of Tiger's glamour looked good so far, but so had the previous one at the start.

"Now we just need to check if it will burst open again," the orange-skinned girl said as she took a few steps back. "Golem, copy my movements!" she commanded as she started doing jumping jacks.

The statue diligently mirrored Tiger's actions, without causing any disturbing tearing noises or spurting blood.

Encouraged, the youma moved on to more challenging stretching exercises that Ami recognised from gym class.

So far, the golem's skin seemed to remain intact even as she explored the limits of human motion. When she tried to mimic Tiger balancing on one leg, she fell over since she had a different centre of gravity, but even her scrapes looked realistic.

"Yeah, I think that's enough," Tiger said, stopping with the exercises. "Looks like a success to me."

"It would be good if the glamour did something about changing the clothes too," Ami suggested, her cheeks burning. She didn't want to find out what wearing ice chainmail on bare skin felt like.

"And add even more complexity to the spell? Remember, you still have to learn it. Just transform before you use it or get changed the normal way."

Ami nodded. That was a solution she could live with.

"I still don't get why you don't just have Jadeite apply the glamour before you leave," her adopted sister continued.

"He won't be around when I go visit the duke of Salthalls," Ami answered.

Last edited: Aug 26, 2016

Ultimatum

A group of crows cawed in surprise when a sinister presence joined them on top of the inaccessible rock spire that served as their nesting grounds. Startled, the birds launched themselves into the cloudy sky, ascending in a spiralling path so they could keep a wary eye on the female figure that had disturbed them.

Ami briefly tracked them with her gaze, worried that they would come back to defend their nests. The crows back at Rei's shrine were somewhat aggressive, and the last thing she needed was being pecked at while she was preoccupied with not slipping on the weather-worn stone. There wasn't much room here up here on top of the rock, and taking more than two steps in any direction would send her tumbling down a near-vertical incline into the river below.

About half a kilometre downstream, the stream's slow-moving waters touched the city walls of Salthalls. Taller than the nearby pines, the massive fortifications followed the contours of the river, turning it into a natural moat. The smooth stone blocks on the bottom part of the wall had a muddier tone than the others, indicating that they were frequently submerged during floods.

Since they were above water right now, Ami concluded that the torrential rainfalls caused by her dungeon's corruption hadn't caused the surrounding rivers to swell so far. Good, that was one less thing the dwarves could hate her for. She turned her attention to the war preparations going on in the city proper.

Her elevated vantage point wasn't quite tall enough to peer over the walls, but she could still see the parts of the city that were farther up on the mountain's slope. The most remote buildings were hewn right into the steep mountainside, next to each other, forming tall rectangles with many windows.

Ami felt a pang of homesickness at the sight, as it reminded her of the skyline of a modern city. The scale was completely different, of course. The buildings here were far, far shorter than Tokyo's skyscrapers, and the settlement itself was tiny by her standards. Yet, according to her dwarven prisoners, it was one of the largest cities of their kingdom, with over twenty-thousand permanent residents.

Even that comparatively low number was hard to believe when the parts enclosed by the city walls fit into an area of less than a square kilometre.

Ami reminded herself that most of the city was below ground and that the surface part was the proverbial tip of the iceberg. It wasn't meant to house thousands of people, which showed. Carts laden with supplies slowly forced their way through the crowds, causing her to wonder how people weren't constantly being trampled by the draft animals. There were militiamen everywhere, most of them congregating on the city's open plazas. They had to be levies from the surrounding regions, assembled here to be drilled into proper soldiers. Soldiers she needed to prevent from reaching her dungeon.

With a sigh, she verified that she looked presentable. Under her cloak, a freshly-summoned Sailor Mercury uniform in blue and black remained yet uncorrupted, and the long metal staff she had brought had kept its mirror finish. With no reason to delay announcing her presence any longer, she projected a telepathic message in the direction of the city."*I am Sailor Mercury, Empress of the Avatar Islands,"*she introduced herself.

Ahead, a bridge led over the river, straight towards one set of city gates. The travelers on it froze in mid-step, and an ox bumped into the cart before it when its wagoner failed to pay any attention to it. Sudden silence descended on the city as conversations stopped and workers paused in mid-motion. Wide-eyed, the inhabitants searched for the source of the message or ran for cover.

Ami regretted frightening the civilians, but people had already died in this conflict, and more would die if she didn't hurry and gain the initiative. Besides, the distinction between soldiers and civilians was a fluent one when most of the dwarven military consisted of militia drafted fresh from their villages. "Duke Libasheshtan, I have come to negotiate with you, as is my right as a fellow noble. I am waiting for *you on the rock needle jutting from the river upstream of the city walls," s*he continued.

There was a strangled scream from nearby. A fisherman, his face white as a sheet, stood in the water and gaped up at her. When he saw that she had noticed him, he gulped, gave a shallow bow and spun on his heel. Water sloshed around his boots as he sprinted towards the shore, screaming the whole way. He stumbled twice on loose stones as he scrambled up the river's bank and disappeared between the bushes, still screaming.

He wasn't the only one who had seen her. Ahead on the bridge, the travelers were running toward the city gates, leaving wagons and animals behind. Above them on the walls, more and more bearded faces appeared between the crenelations. Guards pointed in her direction, drawing the attention of those who hadn't spotted her yet. Belatedly, alarm bells started to ring.

As usual, Ami felt uncomfortable with so many people watching her every move. She tried to concentrate on the bright side. With so many eyes on her, she would have nothing to fear from the corruption. "Should you refuse to meet me before noon, I will be forced to seek you out instead," she finished her message, giving the Duke some incentive to cooperate.

From the crenelations, a single bolt arced through the air and splashed into the river before making it even half-way towards her location. The shot wasn't part of a coordinated effort, and the dwarf who had fired it didn't try again, but it was representative of the kind of response Ami expected to her ultimatum.

It would be a nice surprise if the Duke agreed to negotiations, and she would happily take the opportunity if it presented itself, but she didn't really believe it would happen. Nevertheless, giving diplomacy a final chance didn't cost her anything at this point. Her plan to force a meeting was anything but subtle, and she could use the wait to prepare.

In a run-down part of the city, a well-fed and comparatively clean rat hid within a garbage pit from the alley cats above. The animal didn't notice when the light, already dim due to the two-story buildings looming above, dimmed further. A cold, clammy fog expanded from a spot just above the cobblestones, creeping outwards at a sedate pace. Soon, an imp materialised from motes of green light, their glow hidden by the mist. A moment later, the rat had company down in the garbage pit, and the sound of digging rang out, dampened by the magical fog.

Kivith's footsteps echoed through the hall as he hurried towards his master, his cheeks burning with shame. With every step, the wet cloth of his apprentice robes slapped against his shins, reminding him that it was stained with bright yellow liquid. Normally, he wouldn't have cared – potion accidents happened – but today, his master stood at the massive gilded table seating most of the Duchy's highest nobles.

At its head, duke Libasheshtan himself sat on a large oaken throne inlaid with enough gold and silver to hide most of the wood underneath. He had donned gleaming armour, and with his short, smooth black beard and determined expression, he looked as if one of the statues of ancient heroes had come alive.

To his right, countess Zasod looked radiant as ever despite the frown on her face. She was wearing a plain and practical breastplate instead of the more form-fitting ceremonial ones she preferred.

Finally, count Zatkel sat opposite her, to the Duke's right. The count's fingers were constantly in motion as he moved beads on an abacus and jotted down notes, which he passed to the barons and command officers sitting further down the table.

All the splendour assembled around the table made Kivith doubly aware of his own filthy appearance. Approaching the assembled nobles like this was like something out of a nightmare! This was all the Dark Empress' fault for startling him with her message while he was brewing.

His master, the court wizard Mengolin, shot him an impatient look from where he stood beside the Duke's throne.

Kivith swallowed and increased his pace, which had slowed to a crawl without him noticing. The covered crystal ball he was balancing on a small padded tablet suddenly felt very heavy in his arms as he took position at Mengolin's side. "It's her," he delivered the news, his words sounding like a squeaky whimper. Biting his lips, he cast furtive glance at the arguing nobles, hoping they hadn't heard him.

His master lifted the black cloth covering the crystal ball just long enough to verify that it showed the river and part of the city. He nodded and knocked with the bottom of his staff against the floor thrice. All faces turned towards him. "It is confirmed, proven by the divinations," he announced. "The Dark Empress is indeed personally present."

There were gasps and frowns around the table.

One of the barons jumped to his feet. "We must evacuate the-"

"Are we safe-" another began at the same time.

"My men! I have to-" a third shouted without paying attention to his peers.

"We must smite the monster!"

Despite the danger of the situation, Kivith felt relief at the barons' reaction. Everybody was too excited to pay attention to him, the bringer of bad news. It was petty, but he really couldn't afford to make a poor impression on the movers and shakers of the Duchy. He was, to put it mildly, not the most promising of master Mengolin's apprentices. In fact, he had probably been specifically tasked with scrying on the Dark Empress for that exact reason. He was expendable.

Duke Libasheshtan raised his hand. "Quiet. Cease the useless chatter," he commanded, his voice cutting through the noise.

Immediately, the assembled dwarfs fell quiet and looked at him expectantly.

"Yes, that insolent Keeper is here. This changes what, exactly?" he challenged. "She's stuck on the surface, and our citizens are already retreating underground. There's no reason for alarm."

In the privacy of his own mind, Kivith disagreed. The Dark Empress being close enough to rain spells down on the city was very, very alarming indeed. He was glad he was currently in one of the most arcanely protected chambers in the city, even if he felt guilty about doubting the Duke.

"She wants us to overreact in order to disrupt our war preparations," duke Libasheshtan continued. "But seriously, what do you expect her to do? Throw a tantrum and attack us all on her own?"

"Your Grace, she threatened to come after you," countess Zasod cautioned.

"She hasn't brought an army to even make the attempt," duke Libasheshtan said calmly. "Unless one of you has learned something new in the meantime?" he addressed the seated dwarfs.

The nobles turned towards their own court wizards, who were waiting at their side. These senior magicians, easily recognised by the jewelled tabards they wore over their robes, in turn looked towards the back of the hall, to the place Kivith had come from earlier.

In the shadow of ornate stone bookshelves, groups of apprentices were linking hands, working together to mitigate the strain of operating their scrying devices and divination bowls. The youngest member of each group had the duty of keeping an eye on the war council in case their masters wanted to give them new instructions.

These young dwarfs, upon seeing their masters' hand signals, rushed over with long lists of locations and scrying results. Even the children among them were well-dressed and clean, much to Kivith's chagrin.

"So, it seems that there is no trace of an enemy army anywhere within the vicinity of this city," duke Libasheshtan summarised after the wizards had delivered their reports. "Oh, wizard Likotrab?"

A brown-haired dwarf standing behind one of the barons straightened, his expression worried.

"Good thinking checking the bottom of the river. Very thorough," the Duke complimented, and the magician bowed with a proud smile on this face.

"Your Grace?" one of the officers at the far end of the table spoke up. "Some traders reported goblins in the east, near the village of Calmstone."

"Known quantity. We have reports from the area going three weeks past," count Zatkel interjected, not looking up from his abacus. "Additional guards were deployed eighteen days ago."

The officer who had brought the issue to attention nodded and sat down.

"Right. As I said, no traces of an enemy army," Duke Libasheshtan stated with satisfaction. "Still, let us be thorough. Count Ornish."

"Yes, your Grace?" count Ornish wasn't physically present, but a grey-bearded wizard sat in his throne, operating a crystal ball. The Count's voice had come from the orb, which showed his face. It did not show any of his three barons, however, and the three thrones reserved for them at the table remained vacant.

"Have you or your men noticed any signs that Keeper Mercury is moving troops?"

"Her flying vessels keep landing and departing from the tower, but they are not travelling towards Salthalls," count Cornish answered. "I cannot completely exclude some treachery, but they appear to only have small crews when they depart."

"Ah, yes, those things," the Duke said with displeasure.

Flying vessels? Kivith had never heard of them before. He shuddered. How could one even defend against flying raiders? He was suddenly glad his parents didn't live in one of the hamlets out in the countryside.

Paper rustled as Count Zatkel consulted his notes. "There have been no records of these so-called airships either here or in the neighbouring baronies," he said after only an instant of hesitation.

"Glad to hear it," count Ornish said from the crystal ball. "Your Grace, if the Dark Empress is currently distracted, then perhaps now is the time to launch an attack? We have been preparing spells to detect nearby ghosts, and-"

Kivith's master grimaced and shook his head, but the Duke wasn't looking at him. Nevertheless, his next words confirmed that he shared his court wizard's opinion. "Nonsense, distance doesn't stop Keepers from managing their dungeons."

"It doesn't?" Ornish sounded surprised and horrified.

"Indeed not. You stay right where you are, keep your men safe and the enemy contained. I'm still not convinced this entire farce of an ultimatum isn't just another attempt to goad you into attacking. She knows she needs to defeat our forces in detail if she wants to have a slight chance at winning, so we deny her the opportunity."

"As you wish, your Grace," count Ornish said. He didn't sound disappointed at all about not having to lead an assault.

"Good." Duke Libasheshtan looked at the two rows of faces down the table. "I think it's safe to say that our enemy cannot attack the city unless she wants to do so all by herself." He chuckled into his beard.

"But, but what if she does?" a nervous voice asked from among the barons. "She defeated the Avatar, so why wouldn't-"

Duke Libasheshtan snorted. "There is a slight difference between her defeating a single strong opponent in her own dungeon, surrounded by her loyal minions, and between attacking an enemy stronghold filled with thousands of soldiers all on her own. Nevertheless, if she wants to try," he rose from his throne and slammed his palms on the table, "then we'll make her pay for her overconfidence!"

Through the thin cloud cover, the sun was visible as a bright disk as it neared its highest position in the sky.

"Doesn't look as if the Duke is going to show up," Cathy spoke telepathically in Ami's head. "Also, they are loading a nasty-looking bolt into that ballista on the right tower."

Ami took a moment to zoom in on the red-glowing tracery on the arrow-shaped piece of metal. It reminded her of some of the curses described in her library's darker tomes. Surprising to see here, but the effects would probably be limited to the body she was possessing. She still didn't intend on letting it hit her. "I have seen it," she replied.

"So you are really planning to go through with this?" Cathy asked.

"I have to," Ami replied "I won't let this conflict consume any more lives if there's anything I can do to stop it!" If that meant that she had to fight her way to the enemy leader to personally drag him to the negotiation table, well, so be it.

Cathy sighed. "Well, I hope you can pull it off. Even then, I doubt the Duke will be reasonable."

If he wasn't – well, she would take him prisoner and talk to his replacement. She was sure that if she demonstrated a few times that she could get to any noble she wanted, then one of them would eventually be willing to negotiate.

The more pessimistic part of her wondered if that would happen before or after the dwarven army was rendered non-functional due to lack of leaders.

"I will, at least, give the dwarfs a reason to hold off on attacking me," Ami replied. Intimidation was one reason why she wouldn't be trying the subtle approach – this was intended as a show of force. The other reason was that she didn't have enough information about the city for a stealthier approach.

"Your Majesty," Torian's slimy mind-voice intruded on her thoughts.

"The preparations on our side are ready. I have personally made sure to brief each and every warlock on his role in this operation."

"Thank you. Stand by and wait for my signal," Ami answered. She hadn't been idle while waiting either. The dwarven wards that stopped spells from forming would seriously hamper her combat capabilities, and so she had filled her Keeper storage with already finished spells to bypass that problem. She had personally guided individual rats deeper into the city so she had minions to possess if she needed a quick escape. Under the cover of Shabon Spray, she had even been able to sneak some imps past the alarm wards.

Movement on the wall demanded her attention. The huge ballista was swivelling in her direction, the dwarfs manning it cranking small winches to make minor adjustments. According to Ami's visor, the bolt was accurately aimed and would hit either her or the rock she was standing on even without magical guidance.

She quickly checked the position of the sun. Noon. The time limit she had set had passed, so she could just start moving and avoid the coming shot. Simple and easy. But would it send the right message? She was supposed to make the dwarfs believe that she could easily shrug off their best efforts to stop her.

On the tower, a dwarf with purple trim around his helmet brought his open hand down in a hacking motion. The ballista fired, jerking backwards from the recoil as it catapulted the long chunk of sharpened metal towards its target.

The bolt whistled as it shot through the air, going too fast to easily catch it.

Ami, however, already knew the arc it would be travelling on to reach her. She put her Keeper hand in its path, pulling conjured icy gravel from storage to turn it into a physical barrier.

The shot hit the obstacle and passed through it too fast for Ami to grab a hold of the bolt. Her eyes widened fractionally as the shot continued towards her. She'd have to hope her shield would be enough to-

A geyser of hissing water shot up in front of her as the bolt hit the river, slowed down from the mid-air collision enough that it failed to reach its intended target. Underneath the stream's rippling surface, red lights flashed like some kind of underwater thunderstorm.

Even from several meters above it, Ami felt the hostile magic pull on her body, making her fake skin feel both numb and cold. She saw some unfortunate fishes drift to the surface upside-down and hoped that the dwarfs wouldn't be willing to use such dangerous magic within their own city.

The spray of water before her collapsed back into itself, revealing to the defenders on the wall that she hadn't moved at all. Which hopefully looked like confidence in her defences to them, rather than reacting too late to an only partially successful attempt at intercepting their attack. In any case, Ami wasn't about to give them time to think about the situation.

She raised her staff with an exaggerated and superfluous motion. The weapon was a long metal rod with a decorative blue gem on each end. While it could be used for magical purposes, she had brought it mainly to have a melee weapon that was about the same size and weight as a greatsword, but far less lethal. Waving it around was pure theatrics to give the dwarfs advance warning about her counterattack.

High above the tower, above the range of the wards, wisps of green mana crackled and coalesced into a swirl of spiralling bubbles. The ballista operators looked up at the phenomenon that had appeared right above them and immediately decided to jump off their siege engine and run.

Ami waved her staff downwards, and her remotely-cast Shabon Spray Freezing compressed itself into a huge icicle. Gravity did the rest, and she could hear the noise of splintering wood and the dismayed cries of the dwarfs all the way out here on her tiny island.

She nodded to herself as she surveyed the ice-covered remains of the mechanism. Swift, flashy retaliation without casualties. "The operation begins now," she sent a message to her dungeon and launched herself high into the air. Wind whistled past her ears and her cloak rustled behind her as her arc carried her closer to the city.

"Give me the location of Duke Libasheshtan!"

Last edited: Sep 25, 2016

The Upper City

Ami hurtled through the air, following the river downstream towards the city. She didn't have to worry about the dwarfs with crossbows behind the battlements, as she was moving too fast for them to hit her at this distance. Of course, she couldn't jump far enough to reach the city in a single leap and soon descended towards the surface of the river.

As she approached her mirror image on the water below, she crossed her arms before thrusting them forward, and fired a burst of blue-glowing bubbles right at her predicted landing spot. An instant later, the ice of the newly-created platform cracked from the impact of her boots. She jumped off again before the ice floe could dip underwater, the recoil making it bob like a cork on the waves.

Leapfrogging across frozen platforms, she neared the wall. She was already staring up at the fortifications before its defenders could gather. The battlements loomed above her like a toothy horizon, and a few helmeted heads were visible against the backdrop of the sky. She could hear terse orders from above as well as the cranking noises of crossbows being reloaded.

From this point on, she would have to be wary of wards making her spellcasting unreliable, so it was as good an opportunity as any to show off.

A metal bolt buried itself into the ice at her feet as she paused on the last ice platform. The shooter ducked back into cover while others leaned around the battlements and took aim.

She released the power she had been building up for an extra-strong underwater Shabon Spray Freezing. Ice exploded upwards from beneath her, blossoming out into a jagged, tree-sized spire. She let the surfacing ice carry her higher, muscles tensing in preparation.

The mass of ice below her slowed, and she catapulted herself high into the air. Briefly, she came face to face with a wide-eyed dwarf as she passed him on the way up. He yelped and threw himself backwards, tracking her even as she vaulted over the battlements.

Immediately, she felt an odd resistance in the air that tried to fling her back. Her own magic pushed against it, and she tore her way through the invisible obstacle as if she was ripping a path through spider webs.

With a hiss followed by a loud pop, a protective rune that had been carved into the stone burst apart and caught fire. The resistance decreased, and a weird warbling alarm started howling as more runes lit up.

Having arrived on top of the wall, she took stock of the situation.

The nearby dwarfs were dropping their crossbows and pulling their swords, but most of the guards were still spread out along the wall and rushing towards her position. The ones already close to her were paling, their steps faltering and their gazes flitting back and forth between her and the wards placed in regular intervals along the wall.

She figured that the little symbols were not supposed to be smoking, melting, or exploding into splinters. It didn't take a genius to realise that they were suffering a crushing defeat in the struggle to keep her out.

There was a metallic scraping noise behind her. The dwarf she had jumped past was still on his back, crawling away from her by pushing himself with his hands and feet. Reflected in the shiny metal of his breastplate, she saw a shadowy figure with burning red eyes, wreathed in a corona of writhing dark energy.

If she looked like that while her magic fought against the wards, then it was no wonder that he was backing away, oblivious to the danger of falling into the river.

She couldn't just let him drown, so she had to stop him before he went over the edge. Hitting him with her staff would just push him farther. Could she use magic? He was wearing one of the chain belts that stopped spells from forming, but there was no ceiling above them and she was a Keeper. Her spells didn't have to originate from her own body. In the secrecy of her own mind, she apologised to him as a bolt of blue bubbles fell from the sky and trapped his legs under a sheet of ice.

"Monob! No!" one of the dwarfs surrounding her yelled in dismay, prompted into action by the sudden attack. Foregoing caution, he charged straight at Ami.

The soldier behind him lunged at his back. "Down you fool!" he warned as he tackled him to the ground.

The second bolt of freezing magic from high above struck the floor close enough to frost over both of the prone soldiers' beards.

Ami kept up her suppressive fire, raining weak Shabon Spray Freezing spells down onto the walls.

The nearest dwarfs scattered. Those advancing on her from farther away didn't stop, but they were moving considerably slower with their shields held over their heads, trying to watch both the sky and their step simultaneously.

She figured that she had a few seconds before her opponents got organised enough to attack her seriously. "The Duke?" she mentally asked Torian.

"Crystal ball seven is straight above, eight to twelve provide additional angles," the chief warlock replied.

She stepped behind one of the stalagmite-like mounds of ice created by her bombardment. Protected from the sporadic crossbow bolts coming her way, she focused on her Keeper sight.

Back in her dungeon, the warlocks were assembled in a large room, sitting at desks and staring into crystal balls. Torian was striding through the rows like a teacher supervising class during an exam, hands behind his back and a strict expression on his face.

It wasn't hard to locate the orbs he had indicated, even without reading the large number affixed to each scrying station. The crystal balls in question stood out among the others because they were much more colourful, showing the surface rather than some dark underground place.

The crystal ball with the number seven displayed a pointed roof covered in slate shingles, with no distinguishing features that would allow Ami to tell it apart from the surrounding roofs. The other orbs showed the same house from different perspectives.

She was glad they all agreed on the same target. Finding someone underground was not trivial, and in this first phase, her warlocks had scryed on Duke Libasheshtan and then moved the viewpoint straight upwards until they could see the city. He was definitely somewhere below the shown building.

Unfortunately, that knowledge wasn't immediately useful. She still had to find said building in the unfamiliar city.

She swept her gaze over the sea of roofs and façades that expanded before her. Within moments, she spotted groups of angry dwarfs bearing down on her location, but not her real quarry. Her viewing angle was too shallow to see past the other buildings and the occasional trees.

"Turn the view toward the river, please," she mentally addressed one of the warlocks directly.

The greasy-heared man jumped in his chair and let out a surprised gasp. "Of course, your Majesty!" he said aloud, drawing interested glances from the other warlocks. In his haste to comply with her orders, he almost knocked the crystal ball from its socket as he reached for it. Nevertheless, he managed to bring the river-side part of the wall into view almost as soon as his fingers touched the device.

Ami had no difficulty figuring out her own location in the crystal ball. All she had to do was look at the section of the wall being struck by a hail of aquamarine meteors. Among the glittering mounds of ice left behind by her bombardment, she could see herself as a tiny but still distinguishable silhouette. Holding out her staff horizontally, she rotated on her spot like a compass needle until it was pointing straight at the crystal ball.

Now she had a direction, a rough distance, and a troop of pursuers out for her blood. It was time to start moving towards the imp closest to that location.

The dwarves were poorly prepared for dealing with a fast invader who could jump from rooftop to rooftop, bypassing the streets below.

"After her!" a frustrated voice shouted as Ami crossed a gap between buildings. Behind her, a roadblock that looked like a solid double row of shields and spears dissolved into its component dwarfs. They demonstrated impressive discipline by fluidly recreating their formation so that it was now facing her.

It was too bad for them that she was already two rooftops away when they started jogging after her, still in lockstep.

She skidded down the steep incline of a roof, grabbed onto a chimney with her left hand, and swung around it to change direction. Two iron bolts plinked against the square structure, nicking the smoothly polished stone.

The dwarfs were trying to adapt to her approach. The two snipers who had almost hit her were lying on neighbouring rooftops. One of them got handed a loaded crossbow while she glanced over, and he immediately started taking aim again.

Ami suppressed a flinch as another whistling projectile actually managed to brush past her hair. Being shot at was unnerving even if she knew that the worst she had to fear was punctured fake skin.

Unfortunately, the hail of bolts was growing denser and more distracting. Almost all of the groups of armoured dwarves in the alleys below were carrying ladders now. Ever-increasing numbers of the short, stout figures appeared on top of the surrounding buildings, ready to fight her.

Ami alighted on the gable of another roof, only to find it already occupied.

"H-halt, intruder!" a dwarf in leather armour shouted, waving his sword at her. He had one foot on the rain drain and the other leg bent at an uncomfortable angle so that he was leaning with his hip against the roof's incline. His left hand clawed at the roof shingles as if his life depended on it while he awkwardly wobbled towards her.

Balancing easily on top of the gable, she shot him a pitying look as she walked past. If that was a representative example of the dwarven ability to engage her up here, then she mostly had to worry about them accidentally falling off the roof.

Sudden pain flared in the back of her head as something sharp struck her from behind.

She spread her arms as she almost lost her footing from the unexpected push and barely managed to suppress a surprised squawk. Nevertheless, a loud cheer rose from the dwarfs who had seen her stumble, echoing through the neighbourhood.

Well, it was inevitable that some bolt would hit her eventually, Ami thought. The spot where the bolt had bounced off hurt a little, but she didn't give in to the urge to poke at it. Perhaps protecting herself with a magical shield would be worth it, now that she was approaching her destination? There were too many dwarfs with warding chains nearby to cast a shield targeted at herself, but she had a good number of them in Keeper storage. Unfortunately, they deteriorated quickly when she pulled them out again because they weren't meant to be disconnected from a mana source for even an instant.

Better to save them for when she needed them. Concentrating briefly, she hurled a burst of bubbles from the sky at her own location. Fog crept outwards, covering the roof like a blanket before rolling off its edges like a wispy avalanche. She followed the mist to the streets below, dropping onto the cobblestone road with barely any noise.

"What's going on?" a dwarf asked, his head moving jerkily as he looked around. "Where are you? Anyone?"

Ami had landed so close to him that she could have touched his back if she reached out with her arm and leaned forward. Instead, she pressed herself against the wall of the building and crab-walked sideways.

"Cease fire! Stop shooting right now!" a different dwarf bellowed, both arms raised high. "You are going to hit your comrades like this!"

"S-sir, I can barely feel the ground beneath my feet!" the soldier standing right next to him whined, a complaint that was echoed by those next in line to him.

"Watch out, she's up there!" a frightened voice shouted.

"Where? I can't see anything!"

"Up there! Right there!" The soldier who had given the warning pointed to a first storey balcony with his whole arm, where a flag fluttered in the breeze.

"Give proper directions, soldier! We can't see you pointing!" the commanding officer said, keeping most of the unease his face showed from seeping into his tone.

Ami, being able to see through the fog clearly, kept away from the soldiers who were instinctively huddling closer together for protection. With the way they were acting, they would only find her with sheer dumb luck. "Cathy, this feels too easy," she sent a message back to her dungeon. "Have you noticed something I'm missing?"

"Looks to me as if they are throwing green troops at you and hope they get lucky," the swordswoman replied. "Not as many as they could, either. They are keeping most of the troops on the surface in reserve near that area the crystal balls can't see."

"The entrance to the city below," Ami clarified. Smoothed cliff faces formed a funnel pointed directly at the gate, allowing the defenders to rain death on invaders from the arrow slits above. Since she hadn't brought an invasion force, the obstacle most relevant to her was the wide ramp leading down and passing straight through a temple of the Light. Her skin crawled at the mere thought of trying to move through the towering steel doors, currently open in order to admit the last of the city's civilians to safety.

She wondered if the evacuation of the citizens meant that the surface parts of the settlement were considered expendable. To her, its architecture seemed as if it was meant to last while also being pleasant to look at. Even the façades of the simplest dwellings used blocks of different sizes and colours to create decorative patterns, and geometric engravings embellished the more elaborate buildings.

Under less hostile circumstances, she would have stopped and taken some time to give her surroundings the attention they deserved. In particular, the recurring motif of overlapping squares and cubes in repeating, complex arrangements made her curious. Perhaps she would get an opportunity to appreciate them at a later date, when the current conflict was resolved.

"That way, Sir!" one of the dwarfs in higher-quality armour said, holding something red-glowing with a set of pliers that was pointing straight at Ami. The closer he got to her, the more the glow shifted into orange, and a mild force started pushing against her.

With the bright light of the overstrained ward to guide them, a dozen or so soldiers were actually managing to establish a wide perimeter around her.

Ami frowned and drew on the darker portions of her mana supply, as if she was preparing to cast a corrupted version of one of her spells.

In reaction, the symbol flared up bright and exploded. The tongs went flying, and their wielder yelped in surprise as sharp shards pinged off his armour. Eyes wide, he ducked behind his shield even as his comrades asked him what happened.

Hidden in the mist, she darted past the frightened soldiers who were trying to spot her through the grey, billowing clouds. Her destination was an oak tree, surrounded by a few benches and small flower beds. She hopped up on top of a low-hanging branch where nobody would accidentally bump into her.

"Torian, I am about to spread the lights," she informed her chief warlock. "I want to know the location of the shallowest non-warded rooms and the position of Duke Libashestan as soon as possible."

"As you wish," Torian sent back. In her Keeper sight, she saw him bow reflexively before he relayed her orders to the assembled warlocks.

She dismissed the image and closed her eyes, focusing her attention on listening to the underground. With all of the soldiers and civilians rushing about, the tolling of the bells, and the howling of the alarm wards, she wouldn't have been able to make out any details even if she tried. Instead, she searched for echoes and let them guide her to zones where the sound wasn't dampened by earth and rock.

With no need for subtlety, she immediately began casting spells at any hollow underground areas she uncovered. The vast majority of her workings disappeared without a trace, their effects crushed by dwarven wards just as thoroughly as if she had directed them into solid stone.

She didn't let the failures deter her and kept up her rapid-fire casting, placing her spells at random instead of painstakingly searching for weak points. The dwarven city was too big to protect every single part of it, and occasionally, she felt one of her spells turn into a cherry-sized sphere of light.

"We are getting something now," Torian informed her cheerfully.

The warlocks back at the dungeon were waving their hands rapidly over their crystal balls as they ran search patterns underground, trying to find the chambers Ami had revealed before some dwarf wizards could come and snuff out the lights.

One of the scrying devices went dark, and the warlock glaring at it slammed his fist onto the desk. "A bucket? Seriously?" He rose from his chair and called out to Torian "Hey, tell the Empress that she needs to make the light spells larger! Those midgets are putting stuff over them!"

"Your Majest-"

"I heard him, Torian," Ami answered immediately. Admittedly, placing containers over her light sources was a pragmatic way for even non-wizards to render her light sources useless. She could compensate for this easily enough, but she wasn't too happy about having to switch to creating glowing spheres the size of her torso. The increased power requirements were an inconvenience at worst, but it was harder for larger spells to fit into gaps between wards.

"We still don't have a visual on the Duke, but he is between the orange and the blue lights," Torian reported.

"Good. Keep me informed if he moves," Ami ordered. She was deploying her lights in differently-coloured layers to indicate depth, and now she knew where she needed to go. She programmed the Duke's estimated coordinates into her palmtop computer.

A small green marker appeared on her visor, along with an estimated distance. She turned her head to look at the soldiers rushing past her tree, and the indicator remained stationary relative to its surroundings. Now certain that she would be able to track her target even if she got turned around in labyrinthine underground tunnels, she focused on her dungeon once more.

She smiled at the sight of several crystal balls shining in tones she had used near the surface. "Torian, which of the cyan or white lights are closest to my current position?"

"That would be number twenty-four," the chief warlock replied as he glanced over at a large, window-shaped scrying device that showed the entire city straight from above. Imps were moving little numbers across its surface, indicating which part the corresponding crystal ball was looking at. A small Mercury symbol marked Ami's own location, right in the middle of the cloud of fog that had swallowed a city block.

"It looks suitable," she decided. She left her hiding spot to find the imp she had hidden nearby, her progress largely unimpeded by the dwarven soldiers. There were fewer of them around for her to avoid simply because those who found the edges of her fog were reluctant to re-enter it.

Soon, she reached a well surrounded by a low wall, with a bucket on a chain just waiting to be lowered. She pushed it aside so she had room to slip into the gaping hole. Air rushed past her as she dropped into the darkness, growing colder the closer she got to the bottom.

She struck the water feet-first and pushed through its surface like a dart, only slightly slowed by the impact. Fully submerged, she continued descending until her boots touched solid ground. Despite passing through the water, she was still going fast enough that the landing would have broken her legs if she hadn't been transformed. Rising from her crouch, she searched the unworked rock all around her for an opening.

Above her, hidden just below the surface of the clear water, the wall had a dark hole. Its irregular edges showed that it had been dug out in a hurry. Understandable, since the imp she had tasked with the job would have had to come up for air regularly.

She swam up and squeezed herself into the narrow tunnel, wishing that the imp had at least taken the time to make it large enough to crawl on all fours. Instead, she had to wriggle her way through the entrance like some kind of caterpillar. Then her staff, too rigid to bend, wedged itself against a shallow notch. She almost got stuck and was glad it was too dark for anyone to scry on her. Was the imp farther down the tunnel snickering at her?

With a few contortions and a lot of brute force, she managed to clear the narrow entrance and emerged from the water. The rough corridor was tall enough for her to stand, barely. With her visor's night vision mode, she could see its uneven ceiling only in monochrome tones, which was enough to avoid bumping her head.

Her imp was waiting for her with a grumpy expression, standing in a puddle of water that had dripped down from her wet overall. A trail of puddles led to a pond at the other end of the tunnel, wider than the well. The little worker tapped her mining pick against the ground, watching Ami through half-lidded eyes.

Ami could understand that her worker was feeling impatient. With water closing off both ends of the corridor and no connection to a dungeon heart, the oxygen in the air would be depleted eventually.

Sure, an enchanted mining pick could produce more while digging, but she doubted her imp was smart enough to think of that on her own.

On second thought, the imp was probably just irritated at getting orders she couldn't complete because there was a layer of groundwater-conducting rock in the way.

Ami briefly wondered why the dwarfs were fine with living underneath an aquifer. Perhaps the added protection from digging invaders was worth dealing with a constantly leaking ceiling? Then again, for all she knew the bedrock could be impermeable. In any case, she needed to reach the city, and her imp couldn't work in a water-filled pit.

Fortunately, the bulbous-eyed creature could dig through ice with no trouble.

With Ami's frost spells keeping the water out, the imp was able to mine a steep shaft through the aquifer, towards the chamber her warlocks had indicated.

Ami walked right behind her, a little surprised at the depth of the wet layer. It came as welcome relief when water finally stopped seeping from the walls and she no longer needed to cover them in a layer of ice.

With a quick gesture, a Shabon Spray Freezing shot from her hands and blocked the passage behind her from floor to ceiling. She focused on calling up more power and struck the section behind the ice wall repeatedly with Keeper lightning.

Steam hissed and rock liquefied under the repeated attacks, its red glow visible even through the thick ice.

She only stopped when she was sure that the way she had come was now sealed with a water-proof plug of solidified lava. While she was willing to bet that the dwarfs had protected themselves with floodgates against water-related accidents, she wasn't going to risk their lives unnecessarily.

Her imp had kept digging deeper and deeper into the bedrock. She was now letting out an unhappy squeal with every furious strike of her pick.

Walking closer, Ami spotted the problem. Sparks flew whenever the metal tool struck stone, and progress had slowed to a crawl. Not as much as if the imp was trying to shatter a fortified dungeon wall, but still enough to hint at magical defences. She was reminded of the dwarven railways constructed from reinforced stone.

"Your Majesty? Dwarven soldiers are pouring into the chamber you designated as your ingress point," Torian messaged her.

"Thanks for the warning," she sent back. Her imp's digging hadn't exactly been quiet, but she still had hoped to avoid serious fighting for a while longer. Well, too late to change things now. She transported the imp to some neutral meadows outside the city and focused on her magic.

With a resigned sigh, she slammed the bottom of her staff into the ground. The hardened stone shuddered, cracks spreading outwards as the quaking intensified. With a thunderous groan, the floor crumbled below her, and she fell towards a forest of raised spears.

Making an Entrance

For a dwarf, a spider web of cracks appearing on the ceiling above was one of the scariest things in the world.

Medtob's breath hitched, his muscles tensing for a desperate sprint. Each fibre of his body screamed at him to run; to get away before the cave-in crushed him under tons of rubble. He didn't though, because there was no way out. Standing shoulder to shoulder with his fellow soldiers, he had no room to manoeuvre.

All around him, there was an oddly synchronised metallic rustle as his comrades flinched, having reached the same realization.

Uttering a desperate prayer, he raised his shield and braced for impact.

The cracks in the worked stone above now spanned the entire width of the underground road. As the shaking intensified, dust and small pebbles cascaded into the room, and the sphere of magical light above grew dim.

To Medtob, it looked like the sun disappearing behind clouds.

The ceiling burst into pieces like a smashed plate, turning into a hail of shards and gravel. Solid stone turned into a chaotic avalanche of dust and debris, blotting out the remaining light on the way down.

With terrified resignation, he saw that the biggest shadow was coming straight at him. Reflexively, he ducked and closed his eyes, but somehow, he managed to keep his spear steady. If he was going to die, he was going to die doing his duty-

Pain flared in his wrist as a blow struck his kite shield, forcing his arm lower. The metal rang so loudly he almost couldn't hear the clangs and impacts all around him, though he didn't miss his neighbour screaming in pain and staggering against him.

He fought to maintain his balance, jostling his other neighbour by accident. Surprised to be still alive, he opened one eye.

Right in front of him, someone took a rock to the helmet and went down. Soldiers were yelling, but he couldn't understand anything due to the deafening noise of the stone hail pinging off armour.

A new impact on his shoulder drove him to one knee, and he almost dropped his spear when something pushed against it. There was a horrible, high pitched scraping noise right next to his ear as piled-up debris slid down his shield, and he clenched his teeth in discomfort.

How was he still alive? He had seen that shape above him. It had been larger than him and should have squished him into mangled paste. Not that he was questioning his good fortune, but his survival was nothing less than a miracle.

The room got brighter; the noise diminishing to a patter like hail on sheet metal.

Figuring that all the big pieces had already come down, Medtob dared to peek out from underneath his shield.

Everything looked greyish-white, covered by a blanket of dust. Many of the soldiers around him were on the ground or on their knees, coughing and groaning, but just as many were still standing.

His throat burned from the dust particles hanging heavily in the air, and there was weight pressing against his spear. He looked up.

Crimson eyes glared down at him.

He flinched back, a hoarse shriek escaping from his throat even as his back collided with the soldier behind him.

The Dark Empress herself was floating above him, her blue and black garb untouched by the dust. Wait, she wasn't flying. She was at the centre of a bubble-like shield that glowed purplish-blue where it rested on the spear tips below.

He and the surrounding dwarfs were effectively carrying her.

The bubble wobbled and rolled on the spears whenever they moved, but it touched enough of them to avoid falling down. With every motion, the black cloak of the terrifying figure inside billowed.

He suddenly realised that the large shadow he had seen falling towards him must have been the Dark Empress, not a huge boulder. That explained why the impact hadn't squished him flat. She felt surprisingly light, even if he wasn't supporting her weight alone.

He risked a closer look, fully expecting her body to be living darkness or an animated skeleton or something at least as horrifying. Instead, he saw mostly boots and bare legs that belonged to a scrawny human girl.

If he survived this, he would surely be mortified about having looked up the skirt of an Empress. Right now though, he was too terrified to focus on anything but the danger he was in.

Such as the threat of the weapon she was wielding. She was holding the hefty staff horizontally, and it poked through her shield on both sides, so she could obviously use it to attack if she so desired. The massive thing had to account for a significant portion of the weight he was feeling and could probably punch through armour like a warhammer.

He needed to get rid of her before she killed him.

Instinctively, he looked for a vulnerable spot to stab. The only piece of armour she was wearing was that strange transparent visor dimming the glow of the crimson slits behind it. He wouldn't have to aim carefully at a weak point.

The insane noble's questionable choice of battle attire aside, he was pretty damn certain that just poking at her shield would not get him anywhere. Was there something else he could use against her?

Wait, she barely weighted anything, and he wasn't alone. "Comrades, quickly!" he shouted, his voice scratchy from inhaled dust.

The soldiers farther away turned to look at him, gravel and shavings flying out of beards. Those in range of the Dark Empress kept their eyes glued on her, but their shifting posture indicated that they had heard him.

Keeper Mercury's red-glowing gaze was suddenly focused directly on him.

With a superhuman effort of will, he managed to continue without stammering. "Throw her! Now!" He didn't wait to see if the others would join him before he jumped at the bubble, slamming his shield into it.

With barely any hesitation, the others nearby followed his example. They didn't hit the magical shield all at exactly the same time, but every dwarf still managed to impart some momentum to the Dark Empress.

The hellish red pits that were her eyes widened as she was tossed back up in the air, the spherical barrier around her shimmering from the impacts.

Grinning, Medtob let out a whoop of satisfaction. Bouncing her around should buy everyone a moment to shake off the effects of the cave-in and let the officers come up with a way to breach her magical protections.

With a quiet gurgle, a giant, transparent hand appeared in mid-air. The ball containing the empress slammed into its palm, sending ripples across its surface.

Mouth agape, Medtob stared at the sphere caught between the fingers of the disembodied limb.

That- that had not been part of his plan. Were his eyes playing tricks on him, or was that a faint smile on the Dark Empress' lips?

"You made it worse," one of his neighbours breathed as the hand pushed down, propelling Empress Mercury straight back at them.

The glowing bubble smashed into Medtob much more forcefully than it had the first time.

He caught the impact diagonally on his shield and was shoved into the dwarfs behind him, his efforts to brace himself utterly futile. Gasping as the air was driven from his lungs, he was pinned against the ranks behind him by the curved surface pressing down on him.

There was no room between the dwarfs to fit a sphere as large as the Empress' shield. The hand that kept pushing it downwards didn't care; it maintained a constant pressure and simply forced spears and dwarfs aside. A wave went through the dwarven formation as soldiers were shoved outwards and bumped against each other like dominoes.

Medtob feared that he would slowly be squeezed to death, caught between the transparent bubble and the armour of the soldiers behind him.

Suddenly, the resistance against his back disappeared. The dwarfs on the edge of the formation had fallen over or backed away, giving the deeper ranks enough space to do the same. He had never been so happy to land hard on his back before.

Pain in his legs reminded him that they remained pinned between the enemy and the ground. Above him, spears jabbed at the bubble from every direction, filling the space above his head like the bars of a cage.

Hope reinvigorated him as the shield started flickering from the constant attacks. The Dark Empress was turning her head rapidly as she looked around. Her last manoeuvre must have overstrained her defences.

Hurting, out of breath and prone on the floor, he looked for a way to pitch in. He had lost his spear, but the dagger at his waist remained a serviceable weapon. His hand was already on its sheath when he had a better idea.

Empress Mercury was holding her staff upright in a one-handed grip right now, and the bottom part poked out of her bubble. If he managed to get her weapon away from her just before her shield collapsed, then his allies would have a much easier time defeating her!

He whipped his upper body upwards into a seating position, bringing the unprotected length of metal into his reach. His hands closed around the cold haft of the weapon even as thoughts about curses, traps and lethal wards went through his mind.

He was honestly surprised when nothing terrible happened. Emboldened, he yanked on the staff with his entire weight, trying to get as much leverage as possible.

The weapon gave a little before the Dark Empress tightened her grip and looked down at him in surprise.

Until now, he had thought that her reputed power was an exaggeration. It was hard to believe the slender figure in front of him could be physically strong enough to fight a horned reaper. Now though, he was starting to worry she might simply rip out his arm.

At that moment, the giant hand on top of the sphere lost cohesion and turned into a flood that cascaded down and washed him away.

Ami had left her welcoming committee sprawled out in the cave-in's muddy rubble and was travelling down a wide underground road through the residential area she had dropped into.

Behind closed doors and shutters, families huddled together and tried to hide from her. Only the occasional sounds of crying infants being urgently shushed betrayed their presence. Farther away, rapid, retreating footsteps indicated that the civilians outside of Ami's line of sight were fleeing the area.

She kept moving at a normal pace to avoid catching up with them and causing a panic.

"That enemy formation was eight ranks wide and six deep," Torian informed Ami over their telepathic connection.

That meant her welcoming committee represented less than one percent of the military forces in the city. Its members wouldn't even be out of action for long, at least not all of them. They were good people just trying to protect their homes, so she hadn't hurt them after scattering them. It had already been hard enough to simply leave those with broken bones and bleeding bruises behind, trusting their comrades to tend to their wounds. She didn't want to think of the damage she could have done if her quake spell hadn't been strong enough to reduce the pieces of falling ceiling into small chunks.

"Are they following me?" she asked.

"The effects of your magnificent black mist on the first fool who dared venture into it was quite sufficient to discourage pursuit," Torian answered, his words dripping with malicious joy.

She winced. Her corrupted Shabon Spray Freezing attacked sensory organs and was painful and debilitating. She felt pity for everyone who didn't know better and walked into the thick, stationary black clouds. Nevertheless, the spell was her best option for stopping enemy forces that could rapidly dig through physical obstacles.

"Warn me if more soldiers come my way," she replied, trying to keep her disgust at Torian's amusement out of her voice.

"Of course. That should not be a problem now that our opponents have stopped hiding."

Her chief warlock was referring to the lights that had turned back on, thin stone covers retracting to reveal glowing carvings behind them. The unexpected scraping noise and motion above had startled her at first, drawing her attention to the vaulted ceiling. There, between the criss-crossing support arches, glowing figurines of the sun and stars shone like lamps within recesses.

She didn't know for sure why the dwarfs had decided to stop obscuring her surroundings, but she could make a few informed guesses. The bracelet that warned her of foreign scrying was glowing constantly now, and she suspected that the dwarven mineral sense wasn't precise enough for fighting in the dark.

Tactical disadvantages aside, she was glad she could see her surroundings properly. She would have missed the interplay of colours and shapes on the sculpted, painted façades if she had only seen them in night vision.

Her gaze slid over the fake pillars and support structures that defined the basic design of a façade, skipped over the engravings beside the door, and came to rest on the rectangular depression that seemed to serve as a front yard. In a sandbox littered with hastily-abandoned children's toys, she spotted a half-finished wooden figurine and a carving knife. Its grip was just the right size for the tiny hands of a toddler.

Wasn't that dangerous? She knew that dwarfs loved crafting, but she hadn't known they let children play with sharp tools. It was as much of a surprise as seeing the many plants growing from pots and alcoves almost everywhere. She had expected mushrooms, but these were real, green-leaved shrubs and flowers. Some even formed leafy curtains along the street, hanging down from pots suspended from the ceiling.

Which brought her right back to thinking about the lights. Green plants required strong, constant light to thrive, and the only light sources here were clearly magical. Where did they get their power from?

Her visor could detect mana flows moving through the architecture, guided by both engraved runes and crystalline arrangements. It couldn't tell her where the power was coming from more specifically than "from below", and neither did it provide any hints as to its source.

"Torian, tell one of the warlocks to investigate the lowest levels of the city. I want to know what's down there," she told him.

"Immediately, your Majesty."

Nervously, she wondered if the dwarfs had something like a dungeon heart somewhere within the city. She would never be able to catch Duke Libasheshtan if he had access to a Keeper transport analogue. It was unlikely, she tried to reassure herself. She would have spotted signs of corruption or of minion bonds. Besides, the output of the power source was – was…

She blinked as she realised she couldn't simply calculate an estimate in her mind. The mana was streaming in complicated patterns, often forming cycles that fed back into each other to recycle spilled power.

It was an intricate, efficient pattern that she was going to analyse and incorporate into her own dungeon once she got the time.

"Your Majesty? Unfortunately, the deepest parts of the city are insufficiently lit for a complete survey. They seem to mostly consist of labyrinthine mine shafts, magma, forges, and tombs," Torian reported.

She frowned and spared a moment to consult the notes he had jotted down. From a cursory glance, she got the impression of branching tunnels spreading through the underground like a root system, but there was nothing to suggest a central energy source.

Deciding to question Duke Libasheshtan about this mystery later, she turned left at an intersection, following the marker on her visor that indicated his last known location.

"Ah, your Majesty? Going that way will lead you to a checkpoint with fortified gates," Torian's voice interrupted her musings. "A large force of soldiers including mages and priests is assembling there."

Ami's fingers clenched tighter around her staff, but her steps didn't falter. She had known that some battles would be inevitable when she had come up with her plan. "Thank you, I will prepare accordingly."

The presence of priests was both worrisome and reassuring. On one hand, holy magic made her feel sick, but on the other, those healers could save people if she used too much force in the heat of battle.

Her standard precautions should be enough to deal with them. Since there were no soldiers with spellcasting-inhibiting wards nearby, she replaced her shield and concealed herself with a field of mist. There weren't any other types of wards currently affecting her either, so she could call in some reinforcements.

At her mental command, an imp wearing heavy gloves appeared from a twirl of green motes. Grinning, the worker upended the wriggling bag she was carrying and shook it, dumping a few rats at Ami's feet. The imp teleported back to the dungeon with a faint giggle before Ami could reprimand her about dropping the animals from such a height.

The scared rodents darted away towards the nearest safe-looking crevices and hid, which was exactly what Ami would have ordered them to do if she had gotten the chance.

Disagreeing with the imp's methods but satisfied with the outcome, Ami shook her head and continued on her way. It didn't take her long to reach a larger room where three roads met in front of the gate that her chief warlock had told her about.

He apparently hadn't considered the civilians stuck in front of the blocked passage worth mentioning.

There were about three dozen of them, breathing heavily, whimpering and looking around with wide, fearful eyes. Some of them were praying.

"T-t-the fog is coming!" A flour-stained man with cloth-wrapped beard and hair shouted, pointing in her direction.

Gasps and cries of fear went came from the crowd as its members turned to face her, pressing their backs against the wall. A little boy clutched the hands of his mother and started crying, while his younger sister hid behind her legs.

"No! Nooo!" A woman wearing embroidered leather robes shouted in a shrill, panicked voice. "Let us through! Please! Let us through!" she begged as she hammered her fists against the closed gate that was over four times her height.

The metal of the massive door didn't even budge enough to ring from the impacts. The woman's hands made muted, meaty thuds as they collided repeatedly with the unyielding surface, leaving red smears on it.

"Stop!" Ami shouted.

The civilian dwarfs flinched as her voice echoed in the sudden silence. They froze, keeping their limbs stock still except for uncontrollable shivering.

Ami froze too as she realised that all those pale-faced people were waiting for her to do something. She had only wanted the woman who had been striking the gate to stop hurting herself.

A droplet of blood dripped to the floor as the civilians waited, growing more afraid with each passing second.

Deciding on a course of action, she mentally tagged them as non-hostiles to let them see through her fog.

Eyes widened in horror and pupils contracted into tiny pinpricks as the dwarfs caught sight of her. Someone screamed, and a baby started crying in the arms of a broadly-built woman.

A wealthy-looking dwarf wearing a dark blue jacket over a frilly white shirt took a shaky step forward, placing himself in front of the group. He took off his ruby-topped beret and held it to his chest as he bowed deeply. "E-Empress Mercury, please-"

"Leave. I have no reason to harm you," Ami interrupted and swung her arm in what she hoped was an imperious manner towards the passage farthest from her own. "My business is with Duke Libasheshtan alone."

The man swallowed and bowed again. "Y-yes, of course. Thank you, your M-Majesty."

For a few seconds, the other just stared with their mouths open, as if they couldn't believe what they just heard. Some of the most courageous started moving, imitating the blue-wearing man as they bowed and thanked her. They moved hesitantly at first, shuffling sideways along the wall as they made sure to keep facing her.

It looked almost as if they were expecting her to shoot them in the back the moment they turned away. Ami felt rather awkward as some of them kept bowing in her direction every few steps.

The blue-dressed man glanced nervously at Ami before going back to approach a dwarven girl who remained paralysed with fear. He grabbed her by the arm and dragged her along, all the while watching Ami like a hawk.

She considered the locked gate once more and grew angry. Whoever had given the order to keep it closed had been willing to sacrifice these people just to buy some time. Intellectually, she understood that a fortified door that remained open when the enemy approached was useless, but she still hated that kind of disregard for the fate of the stragglers.

The retreating civilians ducked their heads and moved faster, and she realised that some of her emotions were showing on her face. Forcefully relaxing her features, she distracted herself by focusing on the obstacle instead.

The door was several meters tall and wide enough to drive two carts through it at the same time. Sensibly, its hinges were on the side facing away from her, and it looked sturdy enough to withstand prolonged bombardment with Keeper lightning. It completely blocked off a short, rectangular passage made from the same reinforced rock used in dwarven railways.

The undecorated section looked suspicious to her, and she inspected it more closely. To her side, she heard the sounds of running footsteps as the first of the civilians broke line of sight with her.

Yes, there was a barely visible slit in the roof at the beginning of the fortified part, as well as a matching groove across the road. A portcullis could drop there to trap intruders inside the passage, which meant – ah, up above. The ceiling was slightly angled to conceal the openings of small pipes.

She shuddered as she imagined what it would be like to be stuck between the door and the portcullis while water slowly flooded the chamber, knowing that there was no way out. Not that she had to worry about drowning in her current body. Actually, the dwarfs would be doing her a favour if they tried this on her, since she should be able to use the water pressure and her ice as leverage to crack the door open.

With the last of the civilians gone, she moved forwards, pushing against the same kind of anti-evil wards that had covered the city walls. She didn't see them, but her visor pointed out several rapidly-heating spots just below the road.

"What are the enemy troops doing?" she asked, ready to advance.

"Looking constipated while staring at the gate, getting their weapons blessed, and piling up ammo for their siege engines. In other words, nothing useful," Torian replied "Oh!" he added cheerfully, "someone just set his beard on fire by trying to paint a ward in your presence!"

"Siege engines?"

"Three ballistas and two cannons." He fell quiet for a moment, and then continued in a somewhat more irritated voice "Your Majesty, Cathy informs me that there are a number of bombs placed near the door that I should also count among the siege weapons."

"She is correct," Ami confirmed, "knowing about them is useful." Particularly if she wanted to avoid accidental fatalities. "Thank you. I will proceed now."

Surrounded by her mist, she strode into the passage with confident steps.

As expected, the portcullis came crashing down when she was about halfway through the chamber. The solid plate of steel rang like a bell as it struck the floor, the deafening sound echoing off the bare walls.

Unperturbed, she stopped and stared up at the door, waiting for the water. Was it preferable to break down the gate or the wall? Excessive collateral damage wouldn't do her any favours when it was finally time for negotiations.

The pipes stayed dry but made a noise as if a tide of loose nails was passing through them. A moment later, circular pieces of gleaming metal showered down on her as if it was raining coins. The metallic hail bounced high when it struck the ground, and the pieces striking her shield were slowly wearing it down.

"Are they trying to bribe you?" That was Jered's voice, sounding hopeful.

She caught one of the discs, took a closer look at it, and shook her head. The metal showed the same intricate design as each link of the chains the dwarven soldiers wore to protect themselves from spells.

By now, the things covered the ground in a thin layer. The dwarves wanted to make absolutely certain that she couldn't cast any spells near herself. Why?

"Your Majesty, they are shooting at the gate!" Torian suddenly blurted out.

An instant later, she heard a loud bang, and the door shook.

What were they doing? There was no point in confining her, making sure she couldn't teleport, and then breaking open her prison. She scanned the door for damage, but couldn't spot any deformation in the thick metal from her side.

Another impact rattled her cage, and something cracked and broke on the other side. They were targeting the hinges?

The door wobbled, and its top started leaning towards her.

She understood. They weren't opening the gate for her; they were trying to squish her underneath it. Admittedly, flattening her with tons of metal would work, and none of her stashed spells were intended to protect her from a big slab of falling steel. Her gaze darted back to the portcullis. No room to dodge. If necessary, she could abandon this body, possess one of her safety rats, and try again.

No. She needed to appear unstoppable if she wanted to demoralise the dwarven soldiers. The harder they fought her, the more she would be forced to hurt them. In addition, there was the very real danger that she would run out of prepared spells if the fighting went on for too long.

She grabbed her cloak. It wasn't just a way to hide embarrassing alterations to her wardrobe. Here in enemy terrain, she had no owned territory aside from herself. The cloak was a nice, wide piece of fabric for her to build on. She crouched down, draping it over the floor even as it started fluttering.

A draft brushed over her bare upper arms as the door toppled towards her, pushing the air out of its path.

From the building designs stored in her dungeon heart, she selected the giant sword she had her Keeper hand wield during her conquest of the Avatar Islands. As she drew on her gold reserves, the weapon's sharp tip grew from the dark fabric on the ground and shot skywards.

Air pressure from the falling door blew the coins on the ground around like leaves. The huge steel rectangle had already descended far enough to be more ceiling than wall and had almost reached Ami.

The tip of her giant sword clanged against the falling mass of steel and was immediately dulled by the impact.

However, a cloak did not make for a solid foundation. With an ear-piercing screech, the partially finished bottom of the sword skidded over the ground as it was pushed back by the tons of metal it was trying to support.

Ami made a brief strangled noise as she was jerked backwards by the pull on her garment. The world blurred past her as she was dragged by her neck along the floor, ward-coins digging into her fake skin.

The bottom of the sword hit the portcullis, which arrested its backward motion.

Carried by her momentum, she slammed into the flat of the blade and bounced off.

The half-finished sword wasn't done moving yet. Holding up the weight of the door like a poorly-anchored tent pole, it slid sideways along the portcullis until it finally lodged itself in a corner.

Ears ringing from the noise, fake skin shredded by the coins on the ground, and regenerating one icy arm, Ami sat up in the gap between door and floor.

In hindsight, this hadn't been one of her better ideas. Nevertheless, she had to finish growing her sword and to get moving before the dwarfs came to investigate.

The first sign that something had gone wrong was the horrible metallic screech just after the gate toppled. The next sign was said massive door being slowly raised and pushed out of the doorway it had previously occupied. It crashed to the floor a moment later. Fog and dust poured out of the empty door frame, staying low to the ground like an unrolling carpet.

At that point, none of the watching dwarves were really surprised when a dark silhouette with burning red eyes jumped onto the fallen gate, a ragged cloak fluttering around her. One arm was holding a long, straight staff, the other wasn't visible. Instead, the shadow of a sword as long as door had been tall was floating in the mist, held aloft by a disembodied hand fit for its size.

The Dark Empress permitted her audience a moment to gaze at her in silence before the mist that had poured from the chamber became milky and opaque.

Now the only remaining traces of her presence were her steadily approaching footsteps.

Palace Defenders

Count Zatkel stood with his back to the sealed gates of the palace and compared the disposition of his troops with the plans in his head.

His elite forces, professional soldiers with years of experience each, guarded the final approach to his position. The gently inclined stairway, as wide as the open square at its bottom, tapered towards the top. This was suboptimal, since it meant he could fit fewer defenders on higher ground. He had compensated by placing his top warriors on the lowest steps, where they could swarm any invader.

If the enemy made it that far, she would be stopped at the bottom of the stairs or not at all.

From the square itself, stairs led down in three directions to the garden-like court. Its elevated position made it an ideal spot for his archers, though the round basin of the fountain in the middle took up valuable space. He had already had the decorative spouts deactivated so they couldn't obstruct his men's line of sight.

A sneer flitted over his face as his gaze moved farther, following the two water-filled channels that bordered the gardens and led straight ahead. He grabbed the enchanted amulet positioned exactly under his throat and amplified his voice. "Militia squad eleven, don't treat the water like an impassable obstacle! Our enemy could either freeze it or just jump over it!"

The barely-trained recruits twitched at the sound of his thundering voice. Some turned to face him and saluted, some turned to face their corporal instead, and some just looked at the channel in confusion.

The Count suppressed a grimace. At least these rookies were in a position where they would only encounter combat if they were very, very unlucky. It wasn't impossible, unfortunately. He had run the numbers and analysed the maps, but he couldn't predict with certainty where the enemy would arrive from. One of the many side entrances was the most likely possibility, much more so than her appearing on one of the multiple tiers of balconies that lined the walls. Her climbing down one of the support pillars, which were wider than a dwarf and sculpted to resemble tree trunks down to the bark, was statistically unlikely, but not impossible.

He shook his head, reluctantly emerging from the comforting stability of numbers and probabilities to bring some more much-needed structure to the real world.

His words, while intended for the worst offenders, had been overheard by the other squads along the water. Small numbers of shield-wielding dwarfs were positioning themselves along the shores as their leaders reduced emphasis on the defence of the many bridges.

"It is always good to see some initiative," he muttered approvingly as he memorised the names of the commanders in question.

"Nevertheless, your plan remains terrible, my Lord," the looming figure at his side commented.

He shot his champion and bodyguard a withering look. If it had any effect, it wasn't visible through the man's face-concealing helmet. "For the last time, Baldran my presence here is necessary!"

Baldran was armoured from head to toe in master-crafted steel plate that left no part of his body exposed. Even with no enemy in sight, his hands hovered near the hilts of his swords. "Which is exactly what makes it a terrible plan. I cannot guarantee your safety in a large-scale battle, my Lord."

"We are not having this discussion again," Count Zatkel said, rubbing the bridge of his nose. "I have taken every precaution I could to make this confrontation as one-sided as possible."

A little more than a thousand men were awaiting the arrival of the enemy, keeping close to the palace. The troops under his direct command formed a rough line along the structure's front face, while his barons had fortified their positions along the left and right channels. Together, all three wings of the army formed a kind of horseshoe formation that reached down one third of the enormous hall.

At its other end, opposite the palace, loomed the huge stained glass window of the Shrine of Radiant Mercy. A few civilian stragglers were still passing through its pillar-lined entrance, seeking shelter within the holy site.

Fortunately, he didn't have to protect them or the building. He didn't expect Keeper Mercury to approach it, and if he was wrong, well, that would be one less worry for the Kingdom as a whole.

"Count Zatkel!" a female voice shouted in the distance, barely audible over the chatter of the troops. A messenger was crossing one of the bridges about half-way down the court, sprinting at top speed.

One of the men at the guard posts handed her a large tankard with a lid, which she snatched out of his hand in passing. Some of the drink spilled when she took a swig while running, staining the emblem of Baron Rulal pinned to her leather breastplate.

Count Zatkel waved for his men to step aside, and he rushed through the narrow passage that opened in their formation. A messenger meant urgent news.

The moment the sweat-drenched woman arrived within easy speaking distance, she put her half-empty tankard down, wiped her lips with her sleeve, and saluted. "My Lord." She paused to draw in a large gulp of air.

"At ease. Finish drinking, you look like you need it," he decided.

"No time," she blurted out. "Dark Empress could be here any moment now. Almost through Baron Rulal's defence line when I left!"

His head jerked back a fraction, and he held up his palm. "Wait, already? There are almost two hundred men in her way."

"She's hard to engage. Too much fog, and she has a giant floating sword. Fast, too, and freezes important enemies."

He appreciated the succinctness of the report, if not the content. "What about the Baron?" he asked, grimacing.

She shrugged. "Still shouting orders last I saw him. Enemy had gotten pretty close, though."

"What would you say worked best against her?" he asked, deciding to worry about his vassal's fate later.

"Best?" The messenger paused to think for a moment. "Holy magic makes her flinch if you can hit her. Nets work. Only briefly, because, well, giant sword." She shuddered. "The hand is fragile when it's liquid, but it breaks up into a small flood. Dangerous."

"Can it be captured?" he asked. If he could remove the floating limb permanently, then her most useful tool for fighting against multiple opponents would be gone.

The messenger shrugged. "Don't know, my Lord."

"Anything else that could be useful?"

"No – maybe. She can't hit you with her staff from too close. Kicks and punches instead. Still throws people about, but maybe less lethal?"

"Engage with short swords or one-handed axes," he noted out loud. "Good. Dismissed."

The panting woman sat down on the floor right where she had been standing and went back to drinking.

"Captain, recall the skirmishers. They won't slow the enemy down if more than a dozen squads couldn't. Warn the troops that combat is imminent."

"Immediately, my Lord." A stern-faced dwarf wearing a white cape over his armour bowed. He turned and stalked off, barking orders as he disappeared into lines.

A moment later, horns sounded a warning. Count Zatkel returned to his position in front of the palace gates, his bodyguard always a step behind him. How did Baldran manage to make even his clanging footsteps sound disapproving?

In any case, he had done everything he could to rig the odds in his favour. He still wasn't keen on actually fighting. Battles were messy, chaotic and wasteful. In particular, he hated visiting the families of the fallen. The tears, the guilt, and the awkwardness when none of his memorised lines were appropriate. He tended to upset people when he had to improvise. It was better to avoid all this unpleasantness and resolve the situation without a costly fight.

"You did it, Molnar!" a wide-eyed dwarven soldiers cheered, while others just gaped. "Incredible!"

A dwarf in lighter than usual armour had lunged forward so far his leg, torso, and extended right arm formed a straight line that was almost parallel to the ground. He was wearing a round armoured cap, which did nothing to hide his stunned expression. The surprise on his face was slowly turning into a grin as he stared at his sword, its purple-glowing blade buried to the hilt in the Dark Empress' stomach.

"It really was an impressive stab," Ami agreed in a conversational tone of voice. "One of the fastest I have seen."

Molnar's grin died as she reached down and caught his wrist. He looked up, met her eyes, and his mouth fell open in horror.

She yanked his arm upwards, reeling him in even closer, and slammed her knee into his chin.

Spittle and blood sprayed from his lips as he fell over backwards, landing at the feet of the other soldiers close enough to see her through the fog.

"What the hell?" one of them gasped, taking a step back.

Another stared at the trickle of blood staining the visible part of the blade. "Impossible! With a wound like that-"

She pulled out the sword with a slurping noise. It hurt like a paper cut, but underneath her glamoured skin, her ice golem anatomy was already repairing itself.

The dwarfs started whimpering as she gave the enchanted weapon an experimental twirl. She took a step towards them, and they backed away.

"She- she's not hurt at all!" someone cried out and retreated on wobbly legs.

"Our weapons are useless!" another despairing voice added.

In the fog behind her, a string of clangs and pained cries quickly approached. Her giant sword was returning to her side, moving at chest height. The flat of its blade collided with the soldiers in its path, bowling over everyone who didn't duck fast enough.

The soldiers in front of her broke and ran as soon as its shadow fell over them, escaping through the nearest doorway that was too narrow for it to follow.

Quickly, Ami slammed the door shut behind them and froze it solid in case they recovered their courage. She considered the looted sword she was still holding. It was long and thin, almost like a fencing foil, and clearly magical. Should she keep it? It had pierced through her ice shell with almost no resistance. No, too lethal.

She dropped it near its owner and moved on, taking care not to step on any of the injured dwarfs on the ground.

"The stairway down is behind the fourth door to the left, your Majesty," Torian informed her as she looked down the corridor.

She nodded and dashed forward, throwing the door open only to come face to face with four additional guards.

She braced her feet against the step behind her and swung her staff like a golf club at the shield before her. She liked aiming for shields; they were great targets when one didn't want to cause accidental injuries.

Her blow struck metal with a loud clang and launched the shield's owner backwards, down the staircase. Luckily, he only flew a short distance before slamming into the three dwarves behind him, striking their line like a boulder from a catapult.

The middle soldier took the brunt of the impact and was pushed back, toppling and flailing his arms. In a last-ditch effort to restore his balance, he latched onto the trousers of the man to his right.

His already staggering target yelped as his leg was yanked out from under him. His boots slipped on the smooth stone, its surface wet and slick from the freezing mist flowing down the stairs. He ended up falling on top of the dwarf who had grabbed him.

Together, the three dwarfs rolled down six steps and then hit the wall where the staircase made a right turn.

The only one of the four who remained standing had managed to grab the railing in time. For a moment, he stared at the clattering, cursing and groaning pile of soldiers below before whipping his head back towards Ami. Wide-open brown eyes stared at her through the slits of his helmet. He looked back at the heap of dwarfs, back at her, and then his posture tensed. With his axe raised high, he leapt at her.

His speed wasn't anything noteworthy, and she easily side-stepped the descending weapon. With no dwarfs directly behind him to arrest his fall, she didn't want to throw him down the stairs. Instead, she grabbed his shoulder and spun in a half circle, yanking him along fast enough that his feet left the ground. At the end of her swing, she only had to let go.

He went flying out through the entrance to the staircase, screaming until his landing knocked the breath out of his lungs. He flipped over once and came to a rest on his back, groaning.

Despite her throat being made of ice, she felt a thickness in it as she realised that she had lost count of how many injuries she was directly responsible for today.

"Your Majesty, more troops are converging on your location," Torian's mental voice distracted her.

He needn't have bothered, since dwarfs running in armour were very loud. The clanging footsteps of a large group of soldiers echoed through the corridors behind her, approaching rapidly.

She concentrated. The soldier she had just thrown let out a piercing shriek when her giant sword floated past and blotted out his view of the ceiling. It was too big to pass through the narrow stairway, but it could certainly block its entrance. She leaned it against the wall, gently.

Despite her caution, bits of engravings crumbled under the blade's weight. Down here in the underground city, most surfaces were covered in surprisingly intricate artwork. She had probably just wiped out days of painstaking work. With a chagrined expression, she froze the discarded sword in place.

"That will stop them," she replied to her chief warlock, gesturing at the solid metal obstacle.

"I don't doubt it. Also, Duke Libasheshtan has started moving again," Torian said.

"Circling towards the west?" she guessed as she descended the stairs.

The prone dwarfs she had just defeated froze as she looked at them and wisely let her pass.

"Yes, there's a temple you will need to go around if he gets far-"

"I noticed," she interrupted him. The familiar feeling of holy magic from about three floors down made her hackles rise. Duke Libasheshtan had obviously noticed that she could track him and was leading her through an obstacle course. "Is the way forward clear?"

"About twenty soldiers are just entering the stairway from below-"

She retrieved enough water to form a Keeper hand from her storage, but let it go without trying to control it. It splashed onto the stairs in front of her and flooded downwards with a loud roar.

"-no, they just turned tail and ran out again," Torian corrected himself. "Ah, you flushed them out. Unfortunately, the stairs lead to a wide-open park with an army waiting for you."

Her step faltered, but only for a moment. Lips pressed together in determination, she moved on. Duke Libasheshtan was near, and she only needed to get past the army, not to defeat it.

Fog preceded her out of the doorway, shooting into the open like steam from a broken pipe. The banks of mist piled up on each other, granting her cover as she entered the palace courtyard.

Dwarven trumpets sounded in reaction, playing three short notes.

The presence of the temple behind her felt as if she had suddenly stepped into sunlight – sunlight that was slimy, pressed down on her, and caused her stomach to contract. Which was an impressive feat, since her current body lacked said organ.

She fought down the instinctive revulsion and took in her surroundings, only to pause in surprise at the sheer splendour of the place. It was as if she had suddenly stepped into a cathedral large enough to contain flower beds and rivers. The bridges arching over said channels were richly decorated with engraved plant motifs, and even their railings had stone vines winding around them.

Something glittering above drew her gaze upwards. Shiny bands of metal criss-crossed, forming branching patterns that shimmered in silver and coppery hues. They bundled together into thicker branches centred on the support pillars which held up the vaulting ceiling, reinforcing the impression that they were giant mineral trees.

Only reluctantly, she took her eyes off the fascinating sights to focus on the army waiting for her. The troops had formed lines three to five ranks deep, blocking her path to the palace. A wall of shields was facing her, gleaming like colourful beetle shells in the light pouring from the stained glass window behind her.

"Your Majesty, do you see that fop in between the two statues right on top of the stairs? The one with the beard in a single braid and the rectangular moustache?" Torian's voice asked in her head. "He's the one who has been giving orders here so far."

"Thanks." Knowing where the enemy commander was would be as useful as knowing the disposition of his troops. She spotted a few robed dwarfs with staves sprinkled through the formations, most of them close to the largest, most elaborate banners. Wizards or priests, the primary ranged threat. There were also a large number of soldiers with crossbows on a raised platform behind the shield wall, who could potentially chip away her golem body through weight of numbers alone.

Darkness would be a good way to neutralise the threat of both groups. She glanced back at the temple, whose window seemed to be the main light source. It was arched and split into many vertical sections by slender pillars, since it was too large for the glass to support its own weight. Its abstract patterns were pleasant to look at despite the general unease the temple caused her.

The light also seemed to be coming from the temple's interior, which she wasn't willing to mess with. Not only was she not confident about her chances, but there were also frightened civilians inside. Covering the window with mist from the outside should work, however.

Wait, since when had there been a strong breeze blowing her fog away?

Count Zatkel had complete confidence in the accuracy of his calculations, but not as much in the ability of his subordinates to perform their tasks with sufficient precision. He was therefore very relieved when he suddenly felt wind brush over his face, just as he had planned.

Elsewhere in the city, numerous water basins and reservoirs were draining simultaneously, sucking in air to replace the lost volume. By ordering the right doors opened, respectively closed, he had made sure that the pressure difference pulled the required air right from this chamber.

The resulting breeze was a potent weapon against the Dark Empress' fog, but it would only last until the water reservoirs were empty. For now, it was working as intended and tearing away the blanket of fog she was hiding in.

Banks of mist crawled across the flower beds, retreating from a female figure standing next to a support she could use for cover. The Dark Empress' cloak was fluttering in the wind, and the hellish red glow of her eyes was visible even from his position.

A few of his men blushed or tittered at the sight of her bare legs, exposing themselves as inexperienced young yokels from backwater villages. While her blue and black attire was inappropriate for a noble, a battlefield, or polite society in general, it was downright conservative by Underworld standards.

He supposed he should be grateful that she was wearing something he could look at without feeling embarrassed, especially since she was an empress. The lack of a proper crown was fairly damning, though.

He felt a nudge at his shoulder. "Get on with it," Baldran whispered. "I don't see anything worth staring at like that."

Right, she was incredibly dangerous despite her waifish appearance; something she was currently demonstrating by growing a giant sword from her cloak.

He blinked, took a closer look, and felt the impulsive desire to walk up to her and rap her on the head for making something so shoddy. The thing was poorly balanced, too thick for its length, and even the edges looked dull. Why, if one of his smiths-

Stop, focus. He straightened and activated his voice amplification amulet. "Empress Mercury of the Avatar Islands!" he said, loud enough to reach the farthest corners of the hall. "I am Count Zatkel, ruler of Crystaltunnels!"

She froze, and the red lights in her face flickered for a split-second.

She turned towards him and stared in apparent surprise.

Good, he had her attention and she wasn't advancing farther. "For someone who professes to be here to negotiate, you are certainly behaving very violently."

She actually ducked her head and blurted out something that sounded like a protest, but she was too far away for him to understand the words. Apparently realising this, she straightened and shouted her reply. "You are not giving me any other choice! Nobody was willing to talk to me!"

"You are a Keeper, your Majesty. What could you possibly offer that's worth negotiating about, aside from your complete and unconditional surrender?" He was actually a little curious to learn just how far her insanity went.

The red slits in her shadowed face narrowed. "I- well, you are talking to me right now, so apparently just getting me to leave is worth something to you!" she snapped heatedly. There was a moment of silence, and then she grasped one hand with the other and continued in a much more timid tone "Not that I wanted to escalate things this far. All I want is to stop the fighting. A cease-fire so we can resolve the situation peacefully."

"I don't have the authority to decide something like that," Zatkel replied. Did she really think someone would fall for her blatant attempts to buy herself more time?

"Ah, but you could talk on my behalf to the people who do," the Dark Empress answered quickly, sounding optimistic.

"Well, yes, I could, if I was so inclined."

"Then-"

Unfortunately for her, he wasn't. All he wanted was for her to stay still long enough.

The temple's window shattered outwards. A cloud of coloured glass shards hung in the air like glittering jewels, moving much slower than the magical blast that had disintegrated the work of art. Too fast for the eye to follow, it struck the enemy Keeper head-on and exploded.

Scrying didn't work inside of temples, and none of the robe-wearing dwarfs prominently displayed out here in Zatkel's army were actually wizards. The real magic users had been working on a combined spell while he stalled the Dark Empress, and his plan had worked beautifully.

There was nothing but a barn-sized crater where she had been standing, but he knew how Keepers worked. There was no way this hadn't merely been a possessed body. The most critical part of the operation was only about to begin.

"Fire! Forward, men! Go!" he shouted, just to make sure. They had already been told what to do the moment they heard the detonation, and were rushing towards it.

His crossbowmen, just as disciplined, were firing heavy bolts with very special, cyan-blue tips. Like the fragments of the oversized sword, they started raining down around the black wisp of red-eyed shadow who was rising from the crater.

To the best of Zatkel's knowledge, a Keeper ejected from her host could only do one of three things. Possess another minion, reappear in her true body, or travel to safety.

Now, the ward-tipped bolts currently raining down on Keeper Mercury's location should keep her boxed in, unable to reach either safety or another minion to possess. He was betting that she couldn't exert enough force as an immaterial shadow to push the wards aside, and even if she could - well, there were a thousand soldiers rushing at her who could hold them in place. They would also be useful if she decided to materialise as her true, vulnerable self.

The cloud of darkness looked angry as it shot forward, only to bounce off an invisible surface. It paused for an instant, glaring at the wards in apparent confusion.

When you had the resources of an entire city to draw upon and were facing a Keeper so evil that normal wards disintegrated in her mere presence, then the solution was adamantine.

The darkness fled straight upwards, only to find out that there were wards in the tunnels above the chamber too. Her attempt to sink into the ground yielded the same result.

He would have been lying if he said he didn't enjoy the sight of a Keeper darting around uselessly like a frantic fly. The costs of his plan had been huge, but he doubted that Duke Libasheshtan would care about the expenses once his men had pushed that pesky invader straight into the temple behind her.

Last edited: Oct 29, 2016

Ward Trouble

Ami felt a flash of pain so brief she almost missed it, and the world around her filled with noise, light and motion. Startled, she needed a moment to realise that her host body was gone.

Zatkel had been talking to her to set her up for a sneak attack, she noted numbly. If her immaterial form had teeth, she would have been gritting them. She had been so happy there had been a dwarven noble willing to listen to her. It had felt as if she was finally making progress.

Bitterly disappointed, she drifted upwards through the falling debris to continue her attack. Mentally reaching out towards the rat she had left in the previous room, she launched herself forward to possess it.

Her cloud-like body came to a sudden and unexpected stop as she encountered an invisible obstacle in the air. The confining pressure was unexpected, but not entirely unfamiliar. She had encountered similar resistance before, when she had broken through wards. However, none of those had been strong enough to stop her.

Sliding experimentally to the left and right to test the boundaries of the barriers, she quickly found out that they surrounded her. Even rapidly ascending towards the ceiling and diving into the ground didn't let her slip through the walls of force boxing her in.

It was possible for her to get trapped in her shadow form? Realising that she might be in a lot of trouble, she threw herself against the barriers to break them down. When they failed to shatter, she worriedly scanned her surroundings for their source. Were the wards more effective against her because she didn't have a body, or was there something special about them?

Spotting them wasn't hard, even with the dust and fog blown about by the breeze. In the rubble-strewn area around her, small pyres of crackling black energy sizzled and burned as they eroded the underground. Nearby plants were drying up and catching fire, and the constant discharges of dark energy turned the ground underneath the arcane symbols into fine, scorched powder.

Occasional glimpses of adamantine's light blue shade made it through the corona of dark energies, revealing that the delicate metal constructs remained completely unharmed.

Even though Ami knew of no way to destroy them, she normally wouldn't have been worried about wards small enough to be attached to crossbow bolts. While they wouldn't crumble from her mere presence, they were light enough to shove them aside. Or at least, they would have been if she currently had a body. With a sinking feeling, she realised that she would have to find some other solution before the dwarfs could take advantage of the situation.

They were currently sprinting towards her location, with groups of three soldiers separating from the bulk of their forces. For each trio, one dwarf was wielding a shovel, one was holding a bucket, and the third carried metal tongs as long and thick as Ami's arms. The buckets contained sand, which the soldiers dumped onto the shovels as each group approached one of the blazing wards.

Holding the tongs as far away from their bodies as they could, they reached for the adamantine symbols. Arcs of lightning-shaped darkness flashed between the wards and the tools that gripped them. The soldiers flinched, keeping their distance as they dropped the tiny objects onto the sand-covered shovels.

Holding the tools like that had to be tiring and uncomfortable, but Ami understood why they were doing it. The tongs were blistering and steaming where they had touched the dark energies, and patches of rust were flaking off like snow.

The dwarfs advanced, and so did the barrier anchored to the wards. For each step the formation of soldiers took forward, she was forced back an equal distance. They were pushing her towards the nauseating presence of the temple behind her.

Involuntarily, she turned to look at the building. The huge hole gaping in its window seemed like a maw ready to devour her, with the stumps of its support pillars being the teeth. She didn't doubt that the Light gods could affect her if she entered a consecrated area. They had told her that they would imprison her the next time she entered one of their temples, and then it would be all over. She would never return home, never see her friends and family again, and wouldn't be able to protect he world from the Dark Kingdom.

She couldn't let herself be trapped! At the very least, she needed the dwarfs to stop pushing her. She accessed her Keeper storage to grab a freezing spell, but it didn't work quite as well as she had hoped. The spells were there, but stuck somehow. She didn't manage to get a solid enough grip on them to shift them back into normal space.

What was happening? It almost felt as if her spells were out of reach. Experimentally, she tried flinging one of them at a random tile of her dungeon instead, and was rewarded with a small pillar of ice.

This was definitely a range problem. Apparently, she didn't count as a dungeon heart while she didn't have a physical body. What could she do?

She needed a body. Looking down at the crater below her, she briefly mourned the two safety rats she had been carrying on her person for an emergency like this. They hadn't survived the explosion any better than her ice golem or her giant sword.

Using Keeper transport was out. Even if it had been working correctly, she wouldn't have had any friendly or neutral territory within the barrier to deposit an imp on. She would have to create a new body with a spell.

Which was a sound idea in theory, but the barrier wards weren't her only problem. The dwarven soldiers surrounding her had brought their usual warding chains, which prevented spell effects from manifesting within their protected area.

Those, she could destroy simply by casting enough powerful spells in quick succession. It would take some long and tedious effort, but – "Mercury, do you need help?" Cathy's worried voice appeared in her thoughts. The swordswoman was pacing through the rows of crystal balls, glancing at those that showed the battlefield. "This isn't anything we planned for!"

Ami could definitely use some assistance. It was fortunate that the communication magic targeted at her also affected her dungeon heart, otherwise the spell-cancelling wards around her would not let her receive messages. Cathy was definitely within range of the dungeon heart, so there was nothing stopping Ami from sending her reply.

Nothing aside from the fact that her communication spell was derived from the giant eyeballs in the scavenging room, and that her current shadow form didn't come with eyeballs. This disembodied state was quickly becoming frustrating.

"All right, I'll take your silence as confirmation. I'll send some youma to bail you out," Cathy said after waiting for a few seconds.

She couldn't! They'd die if they tried to teleport into an area covered by the spell-suppressing wards!

The swordswoman turned towards the youma's corner of the room. "Mareki, Umbra, you- eep!" Eyes wide, she took a stumbling step backwards as two squealing imps pounced on her, shaking their heads frantically.

"It looks as if her Majesty does not want your meddling," Torian said, smirking at the blonde.

"Really? I'd have never figured that out without you," Cathy answered with a flat expression. Frowning, she addressed the imps clinging to her arms. "And you, let go already! I got the message!"

Satisfied, Ami focused back on her own situation. Her momentary relief vanished when she noticed how much closer the temple was. She needed a quick solution. Right, she wanted to destroy the anti-casting wards, which meant she needed a barrage of spells. The dungeon heart was out of range, so she couldn't use it to form the spells, but she had never needed it for using her Sailor Mercury magic in the first place.

Concentrating on her Shabon Spray, she hesitated in sudden confusion. How was she supposed to go through the instinctive motions without her hands and arms? It certainly felt as if she should be able to cast the spell even without them, but she didn't know how. She glanced at the ever-shortening distance to the temple. It didn't look as if she would have enough time to figure it out.

Could she push against the wards somehow? The dwarfs carrying the wards had to hold them down with their tongs, so there was definitely some resistance. Throwing herself against the barriers as hard as she could didn't seem to change anything, though.

She remembered when she had visited a Light temple on her own. A force emanating from the building had tried to stop her from approaching. This seemed to be the same effect. At that time, she had been able to push her way through the resistance on muscle power alone, so it probably wasn't strong enough to save her now. Admittedly, she had been in her senshi form at the time, but there were a lot of dwarfs working together.

The temple was looming over her, growing inexorably closer.

She needed to get out, quickly. Could she risk rematerializing? She would be reappearing in her true body surrounded by enemies, and the wizards in the temple would by now be ready to blow up her location again. They were looking very attentive.

She estimated her odds of being able to block their spell as about fifty-fifty. Those were terrible odds when her life was at risk, especially with the dark gods waiting for her. Knowing that the Light would treat her decently if she got captured made her even more reluctant to consider this option. Perhaps she would try it if she had exhausted every other option, or perhaps not even then.

How smart were the anti-spellcasting wards? If they couldn't distinguish between unshaped mana pulses and completed workings, then she might be able to trick them. Would they expend themselves trying to prevent her from channelling magic in short, undirected bursts?

She gathered some power and expelled it in an eruption of blue, green and black sparkles. They expanded outwards in a flashy-looking wave until they hit the barriers, which stopped only the dark-looking motes.

The spell-suppressing wards didn't react, but the closest dwarfs yelled in alarm and threw themselves to the ground to dodge the colourful lights.

Bright flashes briefly drowned out all colour as destructive energies discharged themselves into the wards on the shovels. Some of the sand started melted into glass from the heat.

The adamantine symbols were light enough to swim on the molten liquid's surface, and one of the dwarfs muttered a curse as his ward spilled right off his shovel.

Ami felt a sudden surge of hope. Her opponents couldn't push her into the temple if the wards became too dangerous to move.

The dwarfs were already trying to manoeuvre the fallen object back onto the shovel, using tongs and large amounts of sand.

Having no time to lose, she tried a much stronger pulse than before.

In response, the destructive energies lashing out the adamantine flared up brighter. One discharge struck molten glass, creating a spray of flying droplets, and one of the nearby soldiers started howling in pain.

There were a few clinking noises as the wards burnt their way straight through the shovels and dropped to the ground.

The small disc of adamantine closest to Ami hopped off its perch. Like a coin that had landed on its edge, it rolled past its handlers. An unfortunately-timed discharge catapulted it over the tongs thrown into its path. Surrounded by crackling black lightning, it left a scorched trail in its wake as it accelerated into the line of soldier waiting in the back.

Satisfied to feel the advance of the barriers falter, Ami decided to get rid of the wards by making them melt their way through the ground. Hopefully, the dwarfs would not get themselves burnt badly trying to stop her.

A ball of soft white light hit her from behind, slamming her against the barrier and breaking her concentration. The attack felt horrible, even if it didn't seem to do her any real harm. She turned and saw a group of priests in white and golden robes stand near the temple entrance. The long-bearded dwarfs had their arms raised and were forming more of the white orbs between their hands.

Quickly, she slid aside when one of them hurled the spell at her. She may not have had much room to dodge within the barriers, but her immaterial form was very fast. Having to evade attacks was an unwanted distraction, but a lesser one than getting hit again. She consoled herself with the thought that the dwarfs really wanted her to stop what she was doing.

Ducking under another orb that made her shiver, she heard Count Zatkel shouting orders. Something about salamanders?

There was movement behind the somewhat disorderly front line as soldiers opened gaps in the shield wall. Wheelbarrows with something that looked like primitive bulldozer blades attached to their front rolled towards her.

She didn't need much imagination to figure out what they were meant for. There was some sort of red-scaled leather covering the thick metal parts. It looked similar enough to a horned reaper's skin that she was willing to bet that it protected against heat, too.

Her fears came true when the strange vehicles neared the dropped wards, pushed by heavily-armoured soldiers covered completely in several layers of drenched blankets. Droplets of molten glass hissed as they landed on the wet fabric, but the dwarfs pressed onwards. With large ladles improvised from polearm hafts and helmets, they scooped the adamantine symbols out of their glowing puddles and onto their wheelbarrows. Assistants rushed in from the sides and pinned the wards in place with iron slabs so heavy it took four dwarfs to carry them.

Once again, she felt herself being shoved closer to the temple as the vehicles started moving. She was distressingly close to it already, only about twenty more meters away, and some of the dwarfs started cheering.

Unnerved, she weaved out of the path of another attack. As far as she could tell, the heat wasn't doing anything to the wheelbarrows, but their metal covers were starting to glow a dull red, corroding wherever an arc of darkness touched them. Damage was being inflicted, but not fast enough to prevent her from being forced onto sacred ground.

She needed to intensify the power of the destructive effects and decided to use the most straightforward solution: more evil energy. The strength of the violent flares seemed to be proportional to the amount of black magic stopped by the barriers. Drawing on her dungeon heart, she channelled a greater proportion of evil magic, as if she was trying to cast one of her corrupted spells. This time, she didn't expend it as a pulse, but kept the power flowing out in a constant stream.

A colourless glare seeped out from underneath the metal covers, and the wards slammed against the backs of the wheelbarrows with audible clangs. Their drivers swayed, caught off-guard by the sudden impact, and had to lean heavily against their vehicles to get them moving again.

The wheelbarrows still weren't melting, but the sudden increase in repulsing force from the temple was even better, in Ami's opinion. Stronger evil magic obviously caused stronger rejection from the temple.

Hesitating only for a split second, she accessed the power she had been gifted by Queen Metallia. She didn't like using it, since doing so felt as if she was betraying a part of herself, but she couldn't afford to be squeamish in this situation. She needed evil energy, and what purer source could there be than a dark god?

The dark power flooded through her, leaking out into the surrounding air and attacking the wards.

Flame-like tongues of black energy licked upwards from the wheelbarrows, and the vehicles started quaking and creaking as the dwarfs pushed against them fruitlessly.

It was working! Ami smiled in relief as she felt the vehicles budge and retreat centimetre by centimetre.

A collective groan came from the soldiers surrounding her. One of the closest dwarfs tilted his head backwards to look up at her. His eyes widened behind his helmet, and his tongs slipped from his fingers. "L-light, she's laughing!" he stammered.

Wait, she had a face they could see while she was like this? She paid more attention to the way her form was stretching and bloating from all the dark power she was drawing in. She had apparently grown, as she found the priests' holy spells much harder to dodge.

One of the glowing spheres struck her, and she barely felt it. Still, she twitched from the impact and then almost lost her concentration when she noticed she had hands she could twitch with.

"She's assuming her true form!" someone yelled, voice shrill and high-pitched.

"It's a demon! Kill it! Kill it now!" one of the female soldiers yelled as she raised her crossbow with shaking hands.

"Soldiers, raise shields and brace for impact. Wizards, prepare to fire on my command," Count Zatkel ordered. He waited for three seconds and made a chopping motion with his hand. "Fire!"

Ami knew what was coming, but just like the first time, she didn't see the wizards' combined spell move before it hit her. Briefly, she felt her form tear apart, reducing her to a cloud of shapeless shadow.

Dust and debris shot upwards through her immaterial body, concealing her surroundings.

Disoriented but unharmed, she continued channelling Metallia's power and waited for the airborne debris to drop back into the new crater below her.

As the air currents carried away the floating dust, she found herself facing concentric semi-circles of battered shields. The dwarfs hiding behind the upright rectangles were in the process of standing up again, except for a very few who had been flung onto their backs by the blast.

She was glad to see that none of them were dead. From the sad state of the ruined flowerbed below her, she concluded that the wizards had used a smaller explosion than before in order to avoid friendly casualties. More importantly, the vehicles with the adamantine wards had gained some momentum moving away from her.

The dark power surrounding her was now so thick that it darkened the surrounding air. Like smoke trapped behind glass, it pressed against the barriers and made their boundaries visible.

She could see exactly which parts of the obstacle, formed by the individual spherical field originating from each ward, were giving ground fastest. Directing most of her output towards the weak parts, she managed to make one of the wheelbarrow pushers stagger.

His vehicle jerked backwards, almost running him over before three alert soldiers managed to grab and stop it.

"Men, don't be discouraged now!" Count Zatkel roared. "We are going to win this! The enemy remains contained and victory is close! Everyone, help with pushing the wheelbarrows! We will not fail now! For Nimbadnur, charge!"

With only a few nervous glances up at her, the soldiers rushed towards the stuck vehicles. When there was no more room on the handles for more hands, they put them on the backs of the men in front of them instead. Together, they started pushing, synchronising their efforts with a chant of "One. Two. One. Two."

Their cooperation was bearing fruit as the vehicles started moving towards Ami again. The boundary walls of the barriers crackled with dark energy as both forces collided and the space between her and her enemies compressed. Step by painful step, they reverted the gains she had just made.

Desperate, she tried to draw in more power. Returning to her real body was not a viable option as the wizards had just demonstrated. Motes of blackness coalesced in the air as she was pushed even closer to the temple. The building's presence felt more than a little nauseating now and was sapping her of strength she needed to keep pushing back.

Something bat-like passed her above and shot straight towards the marble walls behind her. It caught fire and burnt to dust before it could splatter on the hard stone.

What was that? She started paying closer attention to the knots of darkness that drifted in the air like snowflakes. One of them collided with a tumbling leaf and sank into it. Even as she watched, the piece of dry plant matter started changing, growing thicker and sprouting tendrils.

Before it could finish transforming, it was catapulted towards the temple and ended its brief existence as a fiery streak.

Suddenly excited, she realised that this was the same phenomenon as the animated dust bunnies back when she had first experimented with Metallia's power. The tiny beings were obviously affected by the anti-evil wards, but didn't contain enough dark power to resist being pushed towards the temple. If one of them survived long enough…

She searched the area below her, spotting a few indistinct forms being flung towards the holy building before her gaze settled on a delightful sight. A thorny plant was stubbornly anchoring itself to the ground with its wriggling roots while its tulip-shaped flower whipped around, its petals gnashing their teeth.

As soon as she identified the body she could possess, she shot towards it. The mindless creature didn't put up any resistance as she sunk into its form, instinctively recognising her as its superior.

The dwarfs cried out in shock as she disappeared from their sight.

Her first priority was protecting her newly-gained and fragile body from the wizards. With access to her storage restored, she drew water from her storage, spraying it towards the temple's window. Hurriedly, she froze the liquid and shielded herself. Now she -

The ice disappeared in a searing flash, and the shockwave from the explosion washed over her shield and made it glow a bright purple.

"Get her! GET HER NOW!" Count Zatkel screamed at his startled soldiers while the thunder still echoed through the hall.

The dwarfs stopped looking at the explosion and focused on her glowing shield. Raising their weapons, they charged through the barriers, shouting battle cries at the top of their lungs.

From the perspective of a defenceless plant, the incoming warriors looked like giants. Ami used up another Shabon Spray Freezing spell and surrounded herself with a barrier of ice, buying herself a few seconds. She needed to move, which meant possessing a new golem body. Dropping one next to her was impossible, since she was on enemy territory, but she could still create one from scratch.

Well, she would be able to do so if she was able to cast spells. Her new body had no limbs, but she could use her dungeon heart to form the spell now that she counted as being in range again. This left the issue of being surrounded by soldiers wearing chains made from spell-suppressing wards.

Quickly, she tried to create a golem among the group of dwarven wizards, who obviously weren't protected by said wards. Otherwise, they wouldn't have been able to create an explosive projectile to hurl at her. Sadly, they were protected by being inside a temple instead. To her remote spell-casting ability, it felt as if the space they were in didn't even exist.

Cracks were spreading through the ice surrounding her as her enemies hacked into it with axes and swords.

"Mercury, they are bringing picks!" Cathy warned.

One of the enchanted digging tools flew through the air in an arc, bypassing five lines of soldiers before someone in the sixth caught it and passed it on. A horribly unsafe but fast method of getting the picks to her location.

She grabbed hold of one instance of corrupted black fog in her storage, but hesitated before releasing it. This was going to hurt a lot of people, something she didn't really want to do. Unfortunately, it was her best shot at driving off the dwarfs striking at her, which would also get rid of the warding chains they were wearing. At least they were right next to a temple where they could get healing, she consoled herself as she unleashed the spell.

The black clouds billowed outwards from her location, enveloping the dwarfs striking at the ice around her. Instantly, they howled in pain and dropped their weapons to grasp at their eyes, ears and noses. Blood stained their gauntlets as they backed off, stumbling into each other. Some were quick-witted enough to shut their eyes, only opening them for brief glances at their surroundings. Those who were still able to grabbed their less fortunate comrades by the arms and guided them in the direction of the barriers.

In this particular case, the impenetrable adamantine wards were working in Ami's favour. They trapped the evil spell just like they trapped her, holding it back from the bulk of the dwarven force and preventing the wind from dispersing her mist.

Using their distraction, she created a Keeper hand and started sweeping away any wards that were lying on the ground.

A large chunk of her ice shelter disappeared in a fiery explosion. One of the wizards on the balcony behind the broken windows was sitting upright, his staff pointed in her direction. The others were still in various stages of picking themselves off the floor, clearly having been too close when their spell blew up prematurely upon encountering her ice.

She quickly hurled a few stored freezing spells in their direction – being unable to target them directly didn't mean she couldn't aim at them the normal way, even if the angle was poor. Hopefully, that would stop them from collaborating on another combined spell. Her Keeper hand took a break from swiping at the anti-magic wards and flew in their direction, only to disintegrate into a spray of water as it crossed the temple boundaries.

A stabbing headache discouraged her from trying that again. She took a little comfort in the fact that the water continued on its trajectory, smashing into the magic users and toppling them. Mission half accomplished.

"Leave your spell-eaters behind!" Count Zatkel shouted from his command post near the palace. "Or better yet, toss them back in!"

The soldiers fleeing from the black fog complied with his orders as best as they could. Even though some of the dwarfs were so disoriented by the fog that they threw the chains the wrong way, enough of them landed near Ami that her situation hadn't notably improved.

By now, she was feeling very tired of hearing the Count's voice.

Her growing frustration aside, she needed to focus on burning through all those chain links before her current body got destroyed. It looked as if the dwarfs were aiming a cannon, and she didn't think their wizards were out of action for good either.

Casting that many powerful spells in the time she had left seemed impossible. Unless…

"Out! Everyone, out of the room now!" she addressed her support crew.

Her warlocks were already half-way to the exit after her first few words. Research magicians who hesitated and asked questions when someone told them to run tended to have short careers.

Cathy was actually the last to reach the door. "Mercury? What's happening?" she asked, looking over her shoulder at the desks melting into an evaporating azure sludge.

"Renovations!" Ami replied as she finished selling off unneeded equipment, which was everything but the mana conduits for her power-hungry crystal balls. With a little tweak to the scavenger room blueprint, she could connect those cables right to the giant eyestalks without things going awry. Probably. For a few minutes, at least.

Pumpkin-sized eyeballs erupted from the floor, riding upwards on red stalks of sinew and muscle. Each one stood where a crystal ball had been, undulating slowly.

"Go back in!" she told the warlocks. "I need everyone to send messages to my current body. Not to me, to the plant," she clarified. "It doesn't matter what you say, only that you keep sending messages."

A communication spell targeting her would just take the shortcut through her dungeon heart. Specifically contacting her host instead would aim it at her current location - where the dwarven wards would try to absorb it before it could take effect. The amount of power contained in a message normally wouldn't even cause one of those chain links grow warm, which was why she was plugging the power supply for her crystal balls into the eyestalks she intended to use as signal boosters.

"It shall be done, your Majesty," Torian said, returning to the room at the head of the group. His confident expression slipped as one of the nearby eyeballs vented sparkling steam. Another was whipping around randomly, while a third was growing oozing bubbles on its stalk. "You heard the Empress! Hurry up!" he shouted as he stepped aside, waving his subordinates past.

Ami felt a sharp dip in her mana reserves, enough to make her dungeon heart supplement her magic from her treasury. One spell strong enough to burn out a warding link was barely noticeable. Over forty at once certainly made her feel the drain. She took it as confirmation that her idea was working.

A constant rumble of rapid-fire snapping noises reached her as link after link of warding chain snapped. Several dwarfs lingering just outside of her caustic fog stared down at their belts and called out warnings to their comrades.

One of them saw that his chain was down to the last four links and straightened up. He snatched one of the picks from the ground, sucked in a deep breath, squeezed his eyes tightly shut and charged straight into the banks of black mist.

She couldn't see his face underneath his helmet, but she could see enough blood to know that he was suffering horribly for his bravery. Once again, she wished the dwarfs were more reasonable so she wouldn't need to hurt people just to survive. She prodded him gently with her Keeper hand, and his desperate, blind charge missed her ice block completely.

Hopefully, others wouldn't follow his example. The idea of good people sacrificing their health or lives to stop her was incredibly disturbing.

Suddenly, a cacophony of voices all talking at once flooded her mind as the communication spells got through.

Immediately, she seized the opportunity to conjure a new body for herself. Gold turned into magical power, and a pillar of ice appeared next to her. It quickly flowed into the shape of a slender human female.

A black tendril lashed out from the animated plant and briefly connected it to the ice golem, whose eyes filled with crimson light. Ami's perspective changed to one she was more used to, and she immediately used her new-found mobility to jump high into the air. Safe from attacks aimed at her previous location, she shielded herself, reapplied her glamour, and triggered her senshi transformation.

Blue light briefly enveloped her form even as her frozen outer layer turned into hair and skin and her Sailor Mercury uniform replaced her ice chain mail. Another quick conjuration at the apex of the leap recovered her cloak, and she felt finally prepared to break free of her confinement.

She landed in a crouch, her cloak draping itself over the ground behind her and providing her with territory from which she could grow a replacement for her giant sword. Now that the closest spell-devouring wards were gone, she could use her entire magical arsenal directly against nearby opponents.

The combined mental voices of the warlocks were no longer reaching her in her new body, as they kept addressing the plant.

"Good work, everyone," she congratulated the magicians. She frowned in the direction of the enemy leader, but her lips twisted upwards in a vicious smile. "Please continue by sending your messages to Count Zatkel instead."

Count Zatkel watched his men through a telescope, wishing they were faster about clearing the ice off the wheelbarrows. He couldn't fault them for being reluctant to get close to the stuck vehicles, as the constant discharges of vile energies against the wards were sending spikes and shards in every direction. Still, he was proud to see his soldiers think on their feet and attach longer handles to picks while approaching behind a multi-layered wall of shields.

His gaze moved onto the billowing black cloud contained between the wards and the temple, and his expression darkened. He was less satisfied with the performance of the wizards. The Keeper's new body was conveniently confined into a limited space right in front of them, so they should have blown her to pieces already!

A sudden patter made him put down his telescope in surprise. It sounded like hail striking armour, but he wasn't feeling anything.

"My Lord, the spell-eaters!" Baldran's urgent voice said to his side.

Reflexively, he looked down at the chain of intricately-crafted wards he had wrapped around his waist. His eyes widened in surprise when he saw that it was only half the length it should be.

In the short moment he remained frozen, three more of the links snapped in rapid sequence.

This was impossible! Nobody could- at least not from over there-

Speechless, he raised his gaze back towards the column of black fog in front of the temple.

A wheelbarrow was flying through the air, spinning and trailing smoke as it travelled on a ballistic trajectory towards one of the room's balconies.

No! The wards! His men had to move to patch up the weak point and-

His hand was half-way up to his voice-amplification necklace when he spotted a small flash that sent another wheelbarrow airborne.

A large bulge deformed the barriers, ballooning outwards. The black fog behind it suddenly surged forward as if a dam had been broken, banks of agonising mist creeping towards his soldiers.

His arms dropped back to his sides, his hands limp. The wards had been breached. This wasn't what he had planned! According to his calculations, the chance of failure was so small that only gross incompetence-

He felt a touch at his shoulder and swallowed around the painful lump in his throat. His bodyguard demanded his attention.

"…Lord, you need to evacuate! Now! Everyone's spell-eaters are disappearing!" Baldran said, tugging insistently at Zatkel's shoulder.

"We can still- no, you are right." He turned towards the stairs just as another ballistic wheelbarrow smashed itself to pieces against the room's wall. "My personal guard, to me. We shall retreat to the Duke's chapel!"

The soldiers wearing the most elaborate plate harnesses saluted and stepped out of their formation to move towards him.

Yes. He would retreat for now. Perhaps he should direct some parting insults at his opponent so that she chased him instead of the Duke? Fighting her way through his army would slow her down enough to give him a considerable head start, so-

Suddenly, he could no longer hear his own thoughts. Voices filled his head, all loud and talking over each other so they merged into an incomprehensible, mind-numbing drone.

He staggered and covered his ears as he frantically looked around, searching for the source of the attack.

His men had stopped too and were grasping at their helmets. Braided beards writhed like snakes and elongated rapidly, while patches of unkempt hair peeked out of visors.

Baldran's helmet popped off his head, and an untamed curtain of black hair spilled out. Grunting, the tall dwarf brushed it aside with his left while pulling his sword with his right.

Before the bodyguard could hack off the offending growth, he staggered backwards, his head pulled down when one of the soldiers behind him stepped on his hair. He had enough presence of mind to let go of his naked blade before he waved his arms to recover his balance, but the damage was done. Like a falling tree, he toppled onto the men behind him.

Mounds of hair cushioned the fall and also muffled its sound, not that Count Zatkel was able to hear this. Wide-eyed, he watched as his elite soldiers entangled themselves worse and worse in the ever-lengthening strands. The only comparable thing he had ever seen was a runaway sheep that hadn't been shorn for seasons.

His soldiers were also growing at an alarming rate, and their struggles were making things worse. "Stop moving!" he ordered, but what escaped his throat was an odd clucking noise.

Eyes bulging, he turned towards a polished shield that had miraculously stayed clear of the encroaching hedge of hair.

A tiny yellow chicken stared back at him from the improvised mirror.

Reeling in shock, he stumbled backwards, only for a flash of green behind him to demand his attention.

He spun and found a blue-clad imp grinning down at him, showing crooked, uneven teeth. Fist-sized eyes sparkled with mischief as they met his own.

Baldran bucked and shouted, but like the rest of the nearby soldiers, he couldn't manage to tear himself free to drive the abominable creature off.

The imp poked her tongue out at the bodyguard and made a rude gesture before she returned her attention to Count Zatkel. Her grin grew toothier as she raised a large, empty brown bag.

Being a chicken offered him a larger field of view than normal, and as the dark opening descending on him, he caught a final glimpse of the Dark Empress. She was standing on her giant sword, leaning into the wind as the ridiculous weapon flew over his army and towards the palace.

Exquisite statues, elaborate wooden panelling and silken banners flashed past Duke Libasheshtan as his donkey accelerated. Some of his best soldiers were right behind him, the sound of their mounts' hooves muffled by the thick carpet.

"Mengolin, what's the status of the Dark Empress?" he asked, turning to his court wizard.

The bearded magician was swaying in his saddle and looked sick. If it wasn't for the apprentice seated behind him and holding him, he would have fallen off his mount already. "Angry and taking the shortest possible path toward us, your Grace," he said in a thin voice as he stared into his crystal ball.

The Duke nodded. If he had to take a shortcut through his palace and let donkeys make a mess of it in order to prevent her from chasing him through heavily populated areas, then that was a sacrifice he was willing to make. Carpets could be replaced, lives couldn't. Nevertheless, he wasn't satisfied. Running from a Keeper within his own city was vexing in a way he found hard to fully grasp. There was worry for his citizens, outrage at the fiend's presence, and growing exasperation that her daring attack seemed to be working so far.

The riders arrived at the marble staircase leading to the lower courts. Now, donkeys were not exactly noble steeds, but they had their advantages. They could certainly carry a dwarf in armour, and more importantly, were experts at traversing difficult terrain. Thus, the riders could continue unimpeded.

Mengolin yelped, and there was a rustle of fabric and a frantic cry of "Master!"

Libasheshtan turned around and saw his court wizard draped over the neck of his mount. The apprentice had a claw-like grip on the back of Mengolin's robe, preventing him from sliding head-first to the ground.

"Sorry, sorry," the court wizard apologised. "I have just learned that she found a counter for our spell-eater wards. This means she can target us if she figures out exactly where we are!"

"We shall keep moving, then," Duke Libasheshtan said. He turned to the figure riding at his side.

Countess Zasod was balancing an active crystal ball on the palm of one hand, keeping her other on the reins of her mount.

"My King," the Duke addressed the crowned figure shown in the glowing orb. "You heard Mengolin's report; the situation is dire. Loath as I am to beg for help, I have no choice but to ask you to send the Avatar to our aid."

The King looked as if he had just bitten into a sour apple. "I would grant your request in a heartbeat if I could. Unfortunately, Lord Amadeus has left the Capital to chase down the minions of Keeper Mukrezar."

The Duke's mouth slackened, and he stared at his liege lord in disbelief. The Avatar couldn't just abandon them in their hour of need! "He left? When the Kingdom is under attack by Keeper Mercury?" he asked in a low voice, slowly shaking his head.

"Yes, that concern was brought to his attention while he was on his way to the hero gate." The King's bushy, white eyebrows narrowed into a frown. "It pains me to say it, but I fear his judgement is impaired when it comes to the new empress of the Avatar Islands."

"Impaired?" Duke Libasheshtan repeated. A man who communed directly with the Light would surely be safe from ailments of the mind. Then what could affect – wasn't the Dark Empress rumoured to be attractive? No. No, he was not going to impute such weakness to the Avatar, not even in the privacy of his own mind.

"I believe his exact words were," the King began, imitating the Avatar's impatient and disdainful tone nearly perfectly, "'just stop provoking the bookworm and she won't bother you.'"

Duke Libasheshtan remained silent as he parsed the absurdity of the statement.

The King sighed. "He proved unwilling to further discuss the issue after my dear wife very diplomatically pointed out that 'it was exactly because of this kind of thinking that he didn't have an empire anymore'," he said, his voice sounding like the Queen's as he quoted her.

Duke Libasheshtan winced. While he agreed with the sentiment, he would have never voiced it aloud in the Avatar's presence. His shoulders slumped. "He will not be aiding me, then."

"I shall, of course, grant you as much support as the hero gates can handle," the King offered. "Elite soldiers, mages, magical items – tell me what you need, and you shall have it."

The Duke shook his head. "Thank you, my Liege, but I am not lacking any of those. All they do is slow the enemy down."

"Then what will you do? Enter the hero gates to escape from her?"

"I am not leaving my city!" the Duke replied, louder than appropriate. He would not repay his people's loyalty by fleeing like a coward. Even if they forgave him, he wouldn't be able to live with the shame of having left his people at the mercy of a Keeper. "Do you think she will be satisfied with having driven me off? She would switch targets or take out her anger on the citizens! I will stay and oppose her to my last breath!"

"In that case, there may be a way to outright slay the monster," the King said after a moment. "However, it will almost certainly cost you your life."

Duke Libasheshtan perked up. He had risked his life in battle before, often for less worthy causes than killing a Keeper. If the price for taking down Keeper Mercury was his life, then it was his duty to pay it. "If I can end this war without a costly invasion of her dungeon, then I am eager to do so," he said.

"Very well. Baron Leopold did not kill the foul Keeper Bartholomeus."

What did the instigator of the great civil war have to do with- wait!

The Duke's gauntlets closed into fists with an audible clang as he straightened his back, feeling a vein pulse on his forehead. "Bartholomeus lives?" he shouted, spittle flying from his lips.

"No, that despicable monster is dead. Calm yourself," the King ordered, waving his wrinkly hand in a shushing motion. "Baron Leopold was made to take all the credit so the true circumstances of the Keeper's death would remain a secret." A predatory gleam appeared in the ancient monarch's eyes. "These circumstances can be reproduced."

Duke Libasheshtan decided to ignore the more surprising parts of these revelations in favour of that which was truly important. "What do I have to do?"

"Buy time. I will send you the equipment that you need, but it needs to be properly installed."

"By the Light, I will do whatever it takes to stall her as long as necessary!" the Duke exclaimed. "Countess Zasod, head to the ritual chamber. I have a plan."

Last edited: Dec 3, 2016

Cornering the Duke

A warm updraft tore at Kivith's robes as he descended the spiralling staircase, keeping close to its outer edge and well away from the gaping abyss at its centre.

In contrast, the blonde girl at his side seemed to relish the feeling of the wind through her hair and stayed closer to the railing than any sane dwarf would consider safe.

Judging from his limited experience, fairies weren't particularly sane. Neither Camilla nor her sisters gave the chasm-like pit the respect it deserved. None of the willow-thin girls seemed to care that their drab grey robes billowed like sails in the wind, ready to carry them off into the darkness.

"So what does the Duke want me for?" the golden-eyed girl asked. She was the youngest of the seven, but he still had to look up at her.

He shrugged. "His Grace merely told me to bring you to the ritual chamber and instruct you in its basic operation on the way, Miss Camilla," he said. In his opinion, there was no need to rely on suspicious foreigners when there were already enough dwarven wizards around. Maybe she knew some rare and exotic spell?

The redhead in front of them harrumphed. "Your Duke is pretty bold to assume that we still want to help him after the endless interrogations and house arrest!" she said, frowning at him over her shoulder.

Kivith blinked. "I thought it was pretty lenient treatment for people like you," he said in confusion.

Anise turned to fully face him, walking backwards as she put her fists on her hips. "And what exactly is that supposed to mean?"

The scowl on her face reminded him that the fairy wasn't only a much stronger magic user than him, but that she was also armed. Coincidentally or not, her hands were very close to the swords at her hips.

"Well, that- you must admit that you were really, really suspicious! You even admitted that you were doing a task for a Keeper, for crying out loud!"

"Delivering a message! It's not like we could just refuse to her face!" Anise objected, not mollified in the least.

"Also, you claimed you were diplomats from a nation we never had contact with all while dressed like Underworlders!" he continued. Seriously, what did they expect looking like something a Keeper cooked up by attaching giant fly wings to some dark mistresses?

They certainly were glaring at him with enough malicious intent to convince him of that origin story on the spot.

"Dressed like Underworlders?" the green-haired one repeated incredulously.

"It's a honoured and traditional uniform!" Melissa protested.

"Are you blind?" Roselle said as she grabbed his shoulder and yanked to spin him towards her.

He shifted a little, but much less than either he or the orange-haired girl had expected. She was obviously much lighter than him, despite being taller.

With a yelp of surprise, she lost her balance and toppled forwards. The cloth covering her back bulged upwards as her wings pushed against it, unable to spread.

Fortunately for her, Anise caught her in her arms before she could fall down the stairs. A small cloud of glitter rose from their collision.

"This. Stupid. Robe." Roselle vented her frustration as soon as she was back on her feet. "I have had enough of it!" She lost no time grabbing its hem and pulling it over her head, leaving her clad only in the garment that had prompted Kivith's incautious comment.

He averted his eyes. She wasn't a dwarven girl, but still not entirely unattractive, and seeing so much bare skin might make him blush.

Unfortunately for him, Roselle had different plans. "Look!" she said, gesturing at her body. "Do you see any black? Of course you don't! It doesn't look like Underworlder garb at all!"

"The colour is not the problem," Kivith muttered, wondering when he had lost control of the situation.

"Not th-"

"Roselle, we are wearing those robes for a reason," the eldest of the fairy sisters interrupted, sighing as she indicated the railing with a glance.

Oh, yes, the other point against them, in Kivith's opinion. There just had to be something deeply wrong with creatures that couldn't stand the touch of good, solid iron.

"I'm going to be careful, Dandel," the orange-haired girl said as she stretched her wings. "Ah, this feels so much better!"

"Just don't forget to look before sitting down. Again," Anise said, snickering.

"Oh, shut up!"

"Sisters, quiet," Dandel said, holding up her hands. "Kivith, I have a question about the ritual chamber for you."

"Yes?" he answered, eager to change the topic.

"Does it increase the amount of magic in the air?"

"Uh, maybe as a side effect? It's mainly used to concentrate most of the mana circulating through the city and putting it at the casters' disposition," he explained as best as he could. The exact mechanics involved hadn't come up in his studies yet.

The fairy brushed her fingers through her indigo hair and let out a long breath. "All right, that explains why I'm feeling a little tipsy. Everyone, high-magic environment."

Her sisters nodded and closed their eyes in concentration.

Kivith couldn't tell what was going on, but he noticed that they all looked more glittery than usual when they opened their eyes again.

"Good," Dandel said after a quick look at the others. She flashed a knowing smile at Kivith. "I think you'll be relieved to know that we should all be a little more focused now. Please, go ahead and continue with Camilla's lesson."

"Oh? Yes. Of course." The sooner he completed his task and was rid of these fairies the better. "We stopped with positioning on the circles, I believe? Well, the ascending-"

A loud gong sounded in the depths, echoing through the wide staircase.

His heart skipped a beat. "Oh, no."

"Looking pretty pale there," Tilia said, a hint of concern in her emerald eyes. "That sound means something bad?"

"It's a proximity warning," he answered. His shoulders slumped as he looked at the stairs spiralling down floor after floor until they disappeared in the darkness below. "The enemy is too close already, we'll never make it in time."

"Perhaps we can travel faster." Cerasse looked him up and down with a contemplative look. "You weigh about as much as one and a half of your barrels of beer, correct?"

That sounded about right. "Yes, but what does-"

"Good. We can carry that much." The indigo-haired fairy proceeded to take off her robe, and her sisters followed suit only moments later.

Comprehension dawned, and Kivith's eyes widened in horror. Despite his best efforts, his gaze darted from the girls spreading their wings to the gaping abyss. He took a step away from them. This was madness!

The worst thing was that it could possibly allow him to complete his task. Duty demanded that he went along with this insanity, and so he settled for whimpering softly as several pairs of hands reached for his limbs.

The dwarven elevator was nowhere in sight, so Ami simply jumped into its empty shaft. Kicking off the masonry, she bounced from side to side as she descended deeper into the city.

"Three more floors," Torian informed her, sounding less certain than usual.

In the monochrome view of her visor's night vision mode, she spotted the exit he had indicated. The doorway was blocked by a thick iron grate.

She had expected needing to go all the way down. Hastily, she extended her legs, managed to tag the wall, and change her course enough to grab one of the bars in passing. She swung so far that she was almost horizontal, nearly losing her grip before she managed to latch on with her other hand.

The grate hadn't even shaken through all this. Forged from high-quality steel to resemble intertwining vines, it was a credit to dwarven craftsmanship.

It would have been a shame to break it – not to mention quite difficult to do from her current position. She would need her Keeper hand to lift it. There wasn't enough room between the bars to accommodate its fingers, so she pulled out mist from her storage, and condensed it into a hand-shaped blob of water around the grate before freezing it.

The resulting hand was more or less stuck in place, courtesy of the bars piercing it, but it could still move vertically.

A mechanism in the wall groaned as she forced the hand upwards, opening a gap between grate and floor that she could swing herself through. The moment her feet touched solid ground, she started running again.

"The Duke has stopped," Torian resumed his commentary. "Looks like he's bunkering up for a last stand."

That was good news. She hadn't been catching up as fast as she had hoped, since the dwarfs had turned off the lights again. Apparently, they had decided that they'd slow her down more by making navigation difficult than by fighting her every step of the way. They were right, too.

"Where?" she asked, hoping that there wasn't another temple involved.

"Close to your position. He is in the back room of a complex of casting chambers."

She wasn't familiar with the term and checked Torian's crystal ball.

The Duke was sitting on a large marble throne covered in branching lines of precious gems, frowning at a wizard standing inside of a magical circle in front of him. The designs on the floor were pulsing green with every motion of the mage's arms and occasionally filled the chamber with opaque but short-lived clouds of rainbow-coloured smoke.

"Do you have any idea what he is doing?" she asked.

"I'm not familiar with the spells involved," Torian admitted. "My best guess is that he's being imbued with powerful protective spells. There are quite a few circuits empowering the central sanctuary."

To demonstrate, he zoomed out to the much larger room outside. "For example, the shelter stands in one of the focal points of the large ellipse formed by those sixteen subsidiary circles," he explained.

Ami needed a moment to notice the greater design her chief warlock had indicated, since its individual parts weren't all at the same height. The chamber consisted of various plateaus, separated by narrow alleys and interconnected with ramps and stairs. Complicating things further, there were free-standing cylinders that stopped at various heights and never reached the ceiling. She could guess that those could be raised and lowered to form vertical patterns, but interpreting the current configuration of the chamber was beyond her.

"Have someone keep watching the Duke and inform me the moment he starts doing anything," she instructed.

"As you wish, your Majesty."

She continued on in the direction she had been going, having no need to ask for a route. Her visor was showing her mana streams converging all at the same location, which could only be the chamber. One of them crossed her current path, so she simply followed it.

After running for a few minutes, she reached a closed gate fit for a castle. On her visor, it was so covered in annotations that she almost couldn't see the engravings of dwarven wizards within the metal.

"You are standing right in front of the chamber," Torian informed her.

She absently nodded, keeping her attention on the readouts. The doorway was an impressive weave of shields and barriers that extended out into the walls, demonstrating exactly how much the dwarfs wanted to keep her out.

"Is anyone directly behind that door?" she asked her chief warlock.

"Nobody. There are soldiers grouped around the casting platforms, however."

Brute force had served Ami well so far, and she already had a giant sword that could serve as battering ram. With a casual wave of her hand, she propelled the floating object towards the obstacle to test the defences.

It struck the door with a loud ringing sound and bounced back twice as fast as it had come, spinning as it returned towards her.

"Eep!" She threw herself out of the path of the weapon. It whistled past and buried its tip into a wall, where it remained stuck. Wide-eyed, she stared at the blade as it vibrated from the impact.

Behind the door, she could hear alarmed shouts and barked orders. Dwarven voices started chanting, directing magic to rapidly recharge the shield her attack hadn't damaged all that much.

It looked as if she would need to break down the defensive enchantments first. The earthquake spell was designed for the task, having components that worked similar to imp picks in stripping a dungeon wall of its defences. She wasn't exactly dealing with a dungeon wall here, but the same principles should apply.

She stepped right up to the gate, carefully examining it and the walls for traps before she put her hand on the cold metal. A simple, undirected quake would get rid of some enchantments, but it might also rain debris unto the guards. However, if she changed her mental frame of reference a little, then she could convince the spell that she was doing a handstand and that the door was actually the ground.

A moment of concentration later, and the heavy gate trembled as if struck. Weakly at first, it bucked harder with each subsequent jerk, and she could feel the ground starting to shake as the wobbling intensified.

Not waiting for something to violently give way, she backed off and moved aside. She felt rather smug about making the gate smash into its own protections with each tremor, gradually battering them down.

Sparks flashed all over the bucking obstacle, and the dwarven voices became more panicked.

"Oh, they don't like what you are doing at all!" Torian commented with audible glee.

In the time it took to break down the door, she looked at his crystal ball. There were less soldiers waiting for her than Count Zatkel had brought, simply because there wasn't as much space in the room. The soldiers were huddling tightly around the casting diagrams, blocking the way to the wizards. Judging from their full-plate armour and tight formations, these were elite troops that made up with quality what they lacked in quantity.

The magic users themselves were positioned around the chamber in groups of three to six and were facing the door, red-tinged light gathering at the tips of their staves.

Therefore, when the door ripped off one of its hinges, bucked a final time and fell half-way out of its frame, she didn't simply rush in through the gap. Count Zatkel had taught her a valuable lesson about the danger of dwarven wards, and her Mercury Computer was scanning for adamantine, warding patterns, and even fragments of said patterns that could be quickly reassembled.

Finding nothing of the sort, she decided to have an ill-defined Keeper hand, made of only slightly condensed fog, walk on two fingers through the doorway.

An explosion lit up the gap between door and wall, knocking the heavy portal completely out of its bracings. It skidded down the hallway, striking sparks as it dug scratches into the stone.

Taking advantage of the attack's bright flash, she dashed towards the dissipating flames. With her opponents hopefully blinded, this was a perfect opportunity to cross the threshold under the protection of a freshly cast shield.

She had barely entered the chamber when the numbers scrolling across her visor turned red, warning her about the oppressively powerful protection spell layered over the terrace-like plateaus stacked before her. Magical power so thick it tinted the air blue outlined a solid dome that covered the wizards as well as the soldiers.

"Fire at will!" someone in the back shouted.

Her shield rippled from an impact, and two flashes right behind her kicked up dust. Fortunately, most of the wizards seemed too surprised to track her sudden move. In any case, most of them were busy tending to the protection spell.

Involuntarily, she swallowed as she inspected its anchor points in closer detail. Each intricate crystal pattern bundled the incoming mana flows, concentrating them until they rivaled a dungeon heart's output in strength. With eight of those nodes powering the defensive spell, she would not be able to simply brush it aside.

"Torian, report on the Duke!" she ordered mentally as her eyes darted over the forces arrayed against her. He wouldn't be willing to confront her here without a plan, and there were four more currently untapped mana nodes that were making her nervous. Retrieving more spells from storage, she constructed a small barricade from three ice pillars so she had some cover.

"No change in his status, but the other warlocks report that the city has gone completely dark. I assume that all power is being directed to your current location," her chief warlock cautioned.

She nodded, having gotten the same impression. What were the dwarfs hiding underneath their city that could provide that much power, and could she disrupt – she had to move!

Her mist vanished, blown away by a sudden gale. An instant later, the ice barricade protecting her turned into a waterfall that did nothing to hold off the huge bolt of lightning that tore through it.

Some of the electricity was conducted through the ground and raced up her leg making it twitch, but she was no longer close enough to take serious damage. Maintaining her speed, she darted towards the enemies. Their defensive spell, as far as she could tell, wasn't meant to stop physical attacks. If she could slip into one of the alleys between the plateaus, she could avoid most of the incoming fire.

A square pane of force suddenly appeared in her path, conjured by one of the groups of wizards. Like a giant flyswatter, it rushed forward and rammed her. Her own shield failed to cushion the impact, and the room spun around her as she was thrown back.

Wondering when her shield had been broken, she cast a replacement while she flipped herself upright and landed in a crouch. Ready to dodge at the slightest hint of another attack, she tried to figure out what had happened.

A quick glance at the enemy wizards showed her four distinct groups that had hands or staves raised in her direction. It seemed likely that each group had cast a different spell in order to strip a specific layer of her defences.

Experimentally, she released more fog from her storage, fired off a salvo of Shabon Spray Freezing spells in the direction of her opponents, and created a Keeper hand.

Almost immediately, the dwarven wizards started to draw on the mana provided by the chamber. Her fog cloud barely reached car size before it vanished, and her Keeper hand flopped to the ground, splashing her legs and leaving her standing in a puddle.

Her lips parted in surprise. Were they augmenting their perceptions in order to identify and react to her attacks this quickly?

Her freezing spells hit the protective dome and slid sideways, stretching out into rapidly fading smears. The Keeper hand she followed up with evaporated within an instant.

Unhappy with the lack of results, she raised her hand to unleash a bolt of keeper lightning at the magical construct, aiming over the heads of the defenders.

Immediately, several of the wizard formations burst into action. As they intoned their spells, her lightning struck the dome and crawled over its surface without penetrating.

The soldiers right underneath the affected area flinched and ducked their heads, but maintained their formation.

At the same time, the area where she had just been standing filled with multi-coloured bursts of light. Some of the expanding spell effects washed over her mid-dodge, leaving her briefly worried but unharmed.

She bent sideways, twisting out of the path of a greenish beam so bright it made her squint, only to spot a disc of red-glowing energy on the ground where she was about to land. Having only a split-second to react, she hit the spot with one of her stored Shabon Spray Freezing spells.

The resulting steam explosion scattered shards of ice across the room and catapulted her backwards, away from what looked like a fountain of lava erupting from the floor.

She landed on her side, half rolling and half skidding. Out of the corner of her eyes, she saw glowing staff tips tracking her movement. With a well-timed kick, she propelled herself upwards and turned her roll into a hasty tumble, which lead into a mad dash towards the doorway.

Crackling noises and hisses thundered in the air right behind her as she darted out of the chamber.

She grabbed the doorframe with one arm as she passed it, letting her momentum swing her to the side and into cover.

A pinkish light shot past her and etched a rectangular depression into the hallway in front of the doorway, and the hand that was gripping the doorframe stung.

She jerked the limb back and blinked at the stumps of her fingers. There was an odd tingling sensation while they regenerated as icy digits, with neither fake skin nor gloves covering them.

Back in the chamber, the dwarves were jeering and congratulating each other.

Her eyes narrowed as she heard them celebrate their minor victory. Boosting their morale was unfortunate, but at least she had figured out how they were shutting down her defences so fast. They weren't actually reacting to her actions. They simply had enough mages to hit her with every specific countermeasure they had devised at once.

It was a strategy that could effectively keep her from approaching, unless she tried something new. Alternatively, she could try to wear down the defences by throwing spells at them remotely, but she didn't know if she could afford the time necessary.

"Torian, the Duke?"

"His throne is glowing brighter, I think," the warlock dutifully reported. "Unfortunately, we have not made much progress figuring out what he is trying to achieve."

She was certain that whatever it was the Duke was doing, it was in her best interest to not let him finish.

"I see. Backtrack the route I took to get here with your crystal ball," she instructed, glancing at the open doorway.

"As you wish, your Majesty." Torian sounded confused but didn't waste time complying with her order.

In her Keeper sight, she watched his scrying device as tunnels and rooms flashed past, and she assisted him by remotely placing a light spell whenever it got too dark to see. When the view neared the room where the dwarfs had tried to drop the heavy gate on her she interrupted. "Stop, this is the place."

Carefully, she cast additional light spells on the ground level to localise areas not covered by the spell-devouring wards still littering the floor.

The sudden brightness revealed several civilian dwarfs cleaning up the debris. They stared at the glowing spheres in fright and scurried off into the darkness.

Briefly, she worried that soldiers were still around, too, but she couldn't spot any in the crystal ball. She decided to go ahead with her plan, and one of her most experienced imps started moving.

The little creature appeared right on top of one of the light spells, reassured by its presence that she wasn't going to die from a blocked teleportation attempt.

Now that Ami had one of her underlings present, she could observe the area with Keeper sight. Green motes swirled and coalesced into two more of her imps, and she immediately directed her workers toward the chamber littered with coin-sized spell-eater wards.

Working at top speed, the blue-clad imps swept the metallic coins into their bags.

The imps couldn't teleport while carrying the wards, but that didn't stop her from simply using Keeper transport to tuck them into storage. With a chagrined look at the singed tatters of her cloak, she raised her hands to catch the first imp she dropped onto herself.

Snickering, the imp landed feet-first on Ami's head. The creature's cargo jingled as she somersaulted to the ground.

A sudden, tense silence replaced the jeers and taunts from within the chamber. Apparently, the dwarfs had someone watching her.

She was quick enough to grab the remaining imps before they stepped on her and allowed herself a small, satisfied smile as she considered the bulging containers. Even if there were enemy wizards scrying on her, they couldn't see into the bags. Hopefully, the wards would catch them by complete surprise.

"Oh, using their own weapons against them. That's always an admirable classic," Torian piped up. "Will you require additional troops for your assault, your Majesty?"

"That won't be necessary," she answered, hoping she was correct about this. Without the interference of enemy mages, she was confident that she could fight her way through the soldiers on her own.

She raised her arms sideways in a T-shaped pose, making sure she stood perfectly straight. If she made a minor error here, the results would be uncomfortable and inconvenient. Were her shoulders in the correct position? Feet at the right angle? She thought so. Exhaling, she closed her eyes and concentrated.

A suit of powered armour like the one she had worn during the reaper duel appeared all around her the instant her senshi uniform vanished into storage. Something pushed against her right elbow, pressing it inwards, but she had been precise enough that she only suffered minor scrapes.

She had left her feet bare due to the impossibility of making the armour appear between them and the ground while she was standing on it, which she remedied quickly by lifting her feet and completing her ensemble.

Unlike the first version of her armour, this one was conjured entirely so that she could transport it just as easily as her spells. Using gold instead of mana, just like she did for her imps and golems, had made it into the most expensive piece of equipment she had deployed here so far. A necessary precaution to avoid it simply dissolving from blessed water – not that the dwarfs had deployed that against her yet.

Small pricking sensations at her sides informed her that the armour was ready to draw magical energy from her body. With its strength enhancing her own, even the large, two-handed sword she pulled from her Keeper storage felt light as a feather, even more so than she was used to in her senshi form.

She ordered her imps to retreat and approached the doorway. Holding the three bags, she stepped confidently over the threshold.

Streaks of colour shot towards her, curving towards the wards and burning tiny holes into a bag's fabric. Only the spells that created an effect outside of their range remained unaffected.

Moving at superhuman speeds, she turned sideways, letting an orange fireball zoom past her, and then weaved between two slightly slower spells.

Mouths gaped and eyes widened as the wizards saw that their barrage of spells had failed. They paled when they spotted the figure in sleek black armour rushing at them through the dissipating haze of sparkles.

She tore her bags open and swung them, spilling their contents in a wide arc.

The spray of coin-shaped wards passed through the protective dome, devouring a quick-witted spell before it could be completed. The metallic hail rained down on the assembled dwarfs, plinking off metal shields and striking a few of the magic users.

Some of the less alert mages continued casting, and more still-born spells were sucked into the wards littering the casting diagrams. Other dwarfs were already looking at the ground and kicking at the coins.

She tried hitting the enemy line with finished spells she pulled from her storage, but found that the protection spell still held and tore them apart. Under her helmet, her lips pressed together as she realised she could only rely on her physical advantages.

Her enemies recovered from their surprise with commendable speed. A dwarven commander, wearing a helmet that included sculpted armour for his beard, took a brief look at the perplexed wizards and at the coin-shaped wards strewn about the ritual chamber. "Back ranks, pick up those things and throw them out!" he shouted. "Front ranks, engage!"

She leaned forward to gain more speed, preparing to hop straight over the soldiers and take down the magic users. With a strong thrust of her armoured legs, she launched herself into the air, cracking the floor underneath her boots.

Helmeted heads turned upwards as if in slow motion, bearded faces gaping in alarm as she passed over the shield wall. A halberd was the first weapon to swing up at her, attempting to block her path.

She struck at the long-handled obstacle with her sword, batting it out of her path without losing speed.

Two spears rose to block her flight arc, and she brushed one aside with her hand. She couldn't reach the second in time and crashed into the vertical handle.

Below her, the spear's wielder let out a cry of pain as the force of her impact ripped the weapon from his grasp.

Having lost very little of her momentum, she continued on her trajectory. The formation below her blurred past, and she took note of where she would land among the wizards.

The closest of the robed dwarfs were only now turning to run, and she figured that she could take down at least eight of them before the soldiers moved in.

A rattling chain whipped against her ankle and wrapped around it. There was a sudden jolt as it extended to its limit and pulled on her leg.

Reflexively, she tensed her muscles to resist the pull.

The dwarf who had snagged her wasn't heavy enough to stop her, but he refused to let go. He was yanked off the ground and dragged on, smashing into his comrades like a wrecking ball.

Anchored by his unexpected weight, she fell short of her destination. With her captured leg extended straight behind her, she landed hard on her knees and hands.

Metal boots clanged as the soldiers turned and rushed towards her. Dwarfs weren't particularly tall, but seen from the ground, they looked like an avalanche of armour ready to crush her.

Thinking quickly, she pushed herself towards them with her hands, turning so she was lying on her back in the same motion.

The move made the chain around her ankle go slack, and she wasted no time brushing it off with a quick sweep of her sword.

By now, the dwarven soldiers had almost reached her. Some were lunging at her, arms spread wide as they prepared to trap her under their bodies.

Still on her back, she pulled her knees up to her chest as dwarfs sailed through the air towards her. Uncoiling like a spring, she kicked up at the two closest soldiers.

Their armour rang like gongs as she struck their bellies and sent them and went flying back into the mass of incoming soldiers.

Sliding backwards from the force of her own kicks, she remained just out of reach of her enemies. With a quick overhead roll, she managed to get herself into a squatting position, her feet back on the ground.

A glancing blow from a thrown spear left a scratch on the rib-like shapes decorating her breastplate, and a thrown net was flying straight at her.

The last thing she wanted was getting entangled and buried under a pile of angry dwarfs. Rising explosively from her crouch, she catapulted herself upwards and rose like an arrow.

Surging forward, the soldiers swamped her former position and readied themselves for her inevitable descent.

At the apex of her leap, she used the moment she hung in the air to reprioritise. The chamber was spread out underneath her, with the door leading to the Duke's sanctuary a good distance farther back. If she wanted to proceed quickly, she needed to eliminate the protective magic that suppressed her own spells. That meant chasing off the wizards maintaining it, rather than going straight for her target.

Unfortunately, she would first have to get away from the group of soldiers she was currently plummeting right into the middle of.

Faces hidden behind the visors of their helmets tracked her as she descended, and the warriors in full plate shuffled back just enough that she wouldn't land on any of them.

Her feet hadn't even touched the ground when blows started raining down on her from every direction. She parried and deflected as many as she could, power armour and senshi enhancements turning her sword into a blur. Still, it couldn't be in more than one place at the same time, and even though she twisted and dodged, some strikes got through.

She was glad she wasn't there in the flesh. Maces shook her with their impacts, war hammers dented her armour and occasionally pierced the ice below, and even the swords and axes shoved her around with each impact.

Despite her vast physical superiority, she had some trouble striking back effectively. While she was competent enough at handling her weapon, she didn't trust herself to hold back enough if she used it to attack. She swept the legs out from a soldier in front of her and turned to jab her elbow at someone's helmet while he crashed to the ground.

A soldier immediately jumped over the prone body, swinging his mace in an overhead swing.

She backed off, deliberately ramming the soldiers behind her in the process. This turned out to be a bit of a tactical blunder, as she felt arms wrap around her waist.

More dwarfs caught on to the idea and lunged, grabbing hold of her wherever they could as they tried to wrestle her to the ground.

Her helmet rang uncomfortably loud as she headbutted an attacker who had wrapped his arms around her neck. He slid off, and she gritted her teeth when another immediately jumped to replace him. At least nobody could effectively attack her while she had dwarven bodies draped all over her, but she couldn't allow herself to be restrained.

Time wasn't on her side. Everyone she wasn't fighting directly was sweeping the spell-eater wards away, and she didn't want to find out what their wizards could do while she was unable to dodge.

"Where are the chains? Hurry before she breaks free!" someone shouted.

She took this as her cue to leave. If they thought the weight of a few dwarfs was enough to stop her, then they were still underestimating her strength. Even with them hanging off her, she managed to rise and stand straight. Slowly at first, she started to spin in place, dragging the soldiers on top of her along.

As she picked up speed, their feet left the ground. One by one, they lost their grips as the centrifugal forces tore at them until only two remained.

The last two were screaming as they whistled through the air like flails, unable to get loose because she had gripped their hands and wasn't letting go.

Their metal greaves and boots smashed into their comrades as she spun like a top, forcing everyone nearby back or to the floor. Soon, every enemy within reach was either down or ducking underneath her improvised weapons, and she released her captives.

With startled yells, they were flung into the ranks of the soldiers encircling her.

Having cleared her immediate vicinity of everyone who could hold her down, she leapt towards the closest half-pillar. This time, she was ready as more nets and chains lashed at her, and nimbly avoided the restraints.

A wizard was hurrying down the ladder at the pillar's side. His eyes widened in fright as he suddenly came face to face with the red-glowing slits of her helmet.

With a quick swipe of her hand, she brushed him off the ladder, mentally apologising. She hoped his landing wouldn't hurt too much. At least, it would result in lesser injuries than her armoured body colliding directly with him. She slammed against the stone, held on tight, and slid partway around it. From this new position, she leapt off at almost a ninety-degree angle to her original trajectory.

Below, suits of armour clanked against each other as the dwarven formation skidded to a halt in order to follow her unexpected change of direction.

Her quarry was one of the chanting crews maintaining the protective dome. The colourfully-clad men and women saw her arc over their guards and stopped chanting.

She landed in the centre of their formation, on top of the intricate glowing lines of the arcane symbol they had been tending to.

The magic users were already scattering like scared chickens, revealing hairy calves as they lifted their robes so they could run away faster.

Instead of chasing them, she raised her weapon and brought it down hard on the crystalline symbol instead.

Stone cracked and splintered, and carefully-shaped mana conduits spilled their contents into the furrow her attack had left. It flared up bright like a lightning bolt and melted, scorching and blackening the surrounding lines.

The soldiers she had jumped over were still hot on her heels. A wizard who had fled towards their charge yelped, ducked, and curled up in a ball as the metal-clad horde jumped over him on their way towards her.

Fighting them again wouldn't bring her closer to her goal. With a running start, she leapt again, somersaulted in mid-air, and hit one of the half-pillars feet-first. Bouncing between different pillars, she quickly reached the next node she intended to attack.

As before, most of the wizards were unwilling to face her without their magic available. Only an elderly witch, her wrinkly face distorted in rage, swung her staff at the fast-moving blur that was Ami's form.

She dodged to the side, not because she felt threatened, but for fear of the weapon bouncing off her armour and hurting the frail-looking woman. Unwilling to attack her, she placed her palm on the witch's stomach and walked forward, awkwardly shoving her away from the arcane diagram.

Undeterred, the old woman proceeded to whack her on the head with her staff over and over again, cursing her with language so coarse her cheeks grew hot.

The elderly lady's presence was convenient in a way. The soldiers didn't throw any of their entangling weaponry for fear of hitting her, which gave Ami a few moments to inspect the diagrams on the ground.

Even with the banging of the staff against her helmet distracting her, she quickly deciphered the rough meaning of various lines on the ground. She pulled her sword back and aimed at one particular junction, ready to test her understanding.

Her elbow accidentally hit the old witch, sending her to the ground.

Ami winced at the soft crack she heard, but proceeded to stab her weapon into the design.

Just as she had hoped, the severed conduits spewed forth a spray of green mana that dissipated harmlessly in the air. One more power node offline.

Satisfied, she side-stepped an attempt from the crone to trip her and decided on her next target.

A hard blow to the back of her right knee made her leg buckle just as she was about to jump.

She staggered and turned her head, fast enough that she still saw her attacker retract his leg from his flying kick. While she recovered her balance, she whirled and struck at him.

Grunting with effort, the dwarf let the blow slide upwards along the edge of his own sword, steering it away from his body. He needed to put his free hand on the flat of his blade to steady it, but it was still an impressive feat of strength. Unlike the rank and file of the soldiers pursuing her, he was wearing light leather armour reinforced with metal plates in critical locations. With a lightning-fast twist, he kicked an object on the ground behind him.

She threw herself aside as the net flew towards her, spinning and unfolding. Her opponent was faster than the dwarfs she had fought so far, but she was faster still. Her arm blurring, she darted forward, only to spot movement behind her.

Metal screeched as the blow from the huge axe glanced off her armour, leaving a furrow behind her right shoulder. The brief moment of distraction was enough for her initial attacker to lean aside and let her jab pass.

In contrast to the attacker in front of her, the fighter at her back looked like a knight in heavy plate armour. Nevertheless, he moved almost as fast as some of the stronger vampires she had fought.

A flurry of attacks rained down on her from both sides, and the clash of metal against metal turned into constant ringing noise as she as she whirled and spun to deflect both of her opponents' weapons. Even a horned reaper would struggle to defend himself against the frenzied combination attack, but she managed to always stay a step ahead of her attackers.

Her sword blurred, tracing silvery arcs through the air as it intercepted her opponent's weapons. She was on the defensive, yes, but with her senshi enhancements on top of her powered armour, she didn't feel pressured particularly hard. Already, she could hear her the two dwarfs breathing harder, and their strikes had less and less strength behind them.

Nevertheless, the two champions had managed to monopolise her attention for a few seconds. Their allies took the opportunity to climb after them over the various platforms and to take up more advantageous positions.

When she glanced around, there was a wall of soldiers with nets, chains and hooks ready to keep her from advancing towards the next anchor point of the protection spell.

She pondered her chances of jumping past without getting ensnared, and found them lacking. With a sudden dash forward, she went on the offensive.

Her lighter armoured opponent grunted in surprise when her free hand shot past his blade with a lightning-quick grab and latched onto the bottom of his breastplate. His grunt turned into a strangled gasp when she yanked him upwards, one-handed, and threw him over her head like a javelin.

His comrade took a moment too long to decide between catching his ally and getting out of the way, and the thrown dwarf slammed into his angular chest plate.

Before her improvised projectile could slide completely to the ground, she was already in front of her staggering target. As he boggled at her speed, she grabbed the wooden handle of his axe, immobilising it.

Armoured fingers closed into a fist, crushing the wood trapped between them into a splintery pulp. With nothing to hold the head of the huge axe up, it plummeted to the ground.

In passing, she kicked it aside with her knee as she stepped on the moaning warrior on the ground. She felt bad about that, but he had been aiming his sword at a vulnerable knee joint.

An armoured gauntlet with spiked knuckles rocketed right at her face.

She ducked underneath the punch, rammed her shoulder into the disarmed warrior's chest, and kept going. Half dragging, half lifting the champion, she kept accelerating, hoping that his heavy armour would protect him from what she had planned.

The dwarven champion was as tall as she was, but wider, even with her armour. Chains and snares clanked against his back as she ducked her head and sprinted straight at the soldiers barring her path.

She hit their line like a bowling ball. Screaming soldiers toppled left and right as she bulldozed her way straight through their ranks, internally wincing at every cry of pain.

Then she was through, with no more bodies between her and the wizards around the symbol. Their eyes widened and the determination fled from their faces as they stared at the chaos behind her. After a moment of hesitation, one of them charged at her with a feeble war cry.

Her boots struck sparks on the ground as she braked, unwilling to hit the unarmoured magician with full force. She winced when the champion jerked in her grip, accompanied by a soft thud and a yelp of pain.

The other wizards held their ground on the symbol, their staves shaking in their sweaty fingers as they took up fighting positions.

She discarded her living shield and swept her gaze over the arcane diagram on the ground as she advanced.

Her helmet briefly faced one of the mages directly, and he flinched.

Clearly, he was aware of just how little he could do to stop her without magic, but also unwilling to back down. Then again, there was no telling what surprises they were hiding within their intricately carved staves.

She wasn't going to take them lightly just because they obviously weren't fighters. Ducking and weaving between their attacks, she rushed right into their midst. It didn't take more than an open-palmed shove to toss one after the other away from their diagram, towards the soldiers chasing her.

With the wizards no longer directing the flow of power, only five nodes that supported the protective spell remained. This time, however, she wasn't going to merely render the node inoperable. By now, she had finished her mental math and come up with a working theory of how the arcane symbol functioned, and she had an experiment in mind.

Using her sword as a chisel, she made a slight alteration to the looping lines that allowed the wizards to draw power when they stood within them.

In response, mana fountained upwards from the circle she had modified, rising towards the ceiling as a pillar of brilliant green light.

The incoming soldiers hesitated, shielding their eyes against the glare that was reflected by their armours. "What the- "

"Get over there, now!" an old wizard on top of the highest platform shouted. "Quickly! Destroy the symbol!" he added, speaking so fast that spittle flew from his lips.

She chipped away at the diagrams within a second circle, causing another pillar to join the first.

Nobody looked particularly eager to charge her while she stood between the two emerald geysers, sword at ready and visor glowing crimson.

"…kind of don't want to explode," someone muttered.

"It's just a leak, you fools," the old wizard raged. "The only thing dangerous about it is the way it wastes the magic we need to protect you from her spells! Now do something!"

"Did I stop whatever the Duke is trying?" Ami messaged Torian, happy to get independent confirmation that her analysis of the magical diagram had been spot-on. Now she only needed to defend it while it drained away the power intended for the remaining nodes.

"His throne remains garishly incandescent," he answered, and a little less confidently, he added "We are starting to suspect that it's actually not connected at all to the casting chamber's circuitry."

She frowned at the news even as she brought up her sword to fend off a charge from the no longer hesitant soldiers. Gripping the weapon near its tip with her free hand, she held it like a horizontal bar as she rushed forward to meet them.

The collision sent her staggering backwards, as she hadn't gained enough momentum to make up for the fact that her opponents outmassed her several times. Still, she hadn't been driven back all the way to the node, and the three foremost soldiers she had crashed into had come to an abrupt stop.

Only the press of the bodies behind them was still pushing them forward as they crumbled to the ground, turning into an obstacle for their comrades.

With the soldiers in the middle of the formation slowed down, those on its flanks moved around the congestion and reached her first.

She slammed the flat of her blade against the foremost soldier to her left, throwing him back into the ranks and collapsing that flank. At the same time, the force of her blow sent her skidding backwards, making her wish she had a way to counteract her lack of mass. "Torian, make a note to research a flight spell I can use when I'm not in my own body," she messaged her chief warlock.

"It shall be my pleasure, your Majesty," he replied. "Also, someone is trying to sneak past you!"

Looking away from the right flank, where she had just smashed three opponents to the ground with downward strikes, she spotted one of the champions she had defeated earlier. It was the lighter-armoured one, swinging from a grappling hook attached to one of the half-pillars behind her.

He was holding a round object with a lit fuse in his free hand. With a casual-looking twist of his hand, he tossed it right at the two glowing mana fountains.

Abandoning her holding action, she dived towards the projectile as it arced towards the diagram. Her eyes traced the small black silhouette as it passed the brilliant backdrop of the mana fountains, and she desperately batted her sword at it.

There was clinking noise, and the bomb went flying off. The manipulated node was safe and continued draining mana from the others.

She let out a relieved breath, then cringed when she realised she had no idea where the explosive would land in the populated chamber. Hopefully, its owner had taken the presence of allies into account. Now, which soldiers had gotten close enough during this distraction?

Another clinking noise from above drew her attention back up.

A spinning knife glittered in the green light as it descended from where it had collided mid-air with the bomb. Which was bouncing back towards the diagram and straight at her.

She shifted her gaze away from the almost-burned fuse and onto the lightly armoured champion, still swinging on the rope. His arm remained extended from his throw, and she imagined him grinning smugly under his helmet.

The bomb exploded while she was leaping toward it.

Blinding light and fire enveloped her and flung her away. Momentarily stunned by the noise, she didn't react as her back slammed into a raised shield.

As soldiers pounced on her and dragged her down, the green brilliance filling the room guttered out.

Darn it! No! This had been her chance to quickly regain the use of her magic and end this! The scattered spell-eater wards still stopped her from spellcasting, but it was the dome-shaped enchantment that provided general protection against the finished spells she had brought.

With the leak plugged, the other nodes would quickly regain full strength. They hadn't been weakened as much as she would have liked, but she had to either overwhelm them now or to go after each of them separately.

"Get her armour off!" Someone shouted, and one of the dwarfs kneeling on her chest started tugging at her helmet. Losing it would be a problem, since it housed the armour's control elements.

In fact, the damage to her power armour was slowly adding up. Some of its joints were creaking after the explosion, which was enough to make her reach a decision.

She concentrated and unleashed more of her stored arsenal into the dome than she would have liked.

A small, fiery sun appeared above and smeared out into a spiral - the brief-lived effects of a firestorm spell. Bubbly streaks of grey and azure joined it as Shabon Spray Freezing attacks popped out of storage and hung like snowflakes in the air as they collapsed. Ghostly outlines of Keeper hands flashed into existence and winked out again almost too fast to see.

The dwarves, deeply disturbed, huddled closer together as she kept up her bombardment and prolonged the spectacle. Their mutters grew more worried as the blue tint in the air grew clearer.

A many-voiced cry of pain echoed through the room, and the wizards around the still functioning nodes grabbed their heads.

At the same moment, the liquid for a Keeper hand successfully manifested above Ami, who was too distracted to take control of it.

She sputtered in surprise when it crashed down on her, the short-lived waterfall washing her away along with the dwarves that were pinning her down. Success! With a surge of elation, she sat up amidst the sputtering dwarves, dragging along the particularly tenacious warrior who insisted on keeping her in a headlock.

Somehow, she wasn't surprised to see that it was the champion she had been using as a shield earlier. His determination was admirable, but she still froze him to the ground before prying his arm away from her neck. She also addressed a freezing spell at his bomb-lobbing comrade before moving on, just to make sure he wouldn't inconvenience her again.

Now that she had her powers available, getting past the rest of the defenders was more or less routine. Hide in magical fog, use Keeper hand to clear a path, and freeze it into an icy obstacle where appropriate. Soon enough, she stood in front of the door of the Duke's sanctuary.

To her left and to her right, dwarven soldiers trapped behind frozen barriers shouted threats at her, while in front of her, the door frame was on fire from all of its wards against evil burning out.

Prepared for the worst, she removed her helmet's metal visor, replacing it with the one provided by her Sailor Mercury transformation instead. "Torian, any more info or warnings?"

"Nothing, my Empress. Be aware that the throne looks fully functional, whatever it's supposed to do."

Well, it seemed she would have to scan it personally. With a determined step forward, she reached for the door.

Metal crumpled and bent under her fingers, and with a short yank, she almost ripped the door off its hinges. Purplish smoke escaped from the opening.

She entered, her stride unbroken.

There was a wizard in the back of the room, facing the entrance with wide eyes. He held his hands up protectively, backing away as far as the walls let him.

"It wasn't locked, you know," the figure on the throne commented drily, far less impressed than his court wizard.

"Duke Libasheshtan," she said, inclining her head slightly in greeting. It was the polite thing to do and let her have a good, clear look at the glowing throne.

Nothing she saw was reason for alarm. In fact, she got the impression that its enchantments didn't do anything besides glowing.

Mildly confused, she raised her gaze. "I'm glad to finally-"

She blinked and went completely still for an instant as she processed her visor's readings, and then angrily pointed a finger at him. "You- you are not Duke Libasheshtan!" she accused the dwarf on the throne, whose real face she could see through the superimposed illusion of the Duke's features.

Last edited: Feb 24, 2017

Hunt's End

"Torian, that's not the Duke!" Ami called out mentally, her finger still pointing at the disguised dwarf on the throne.

Her chief warlock's expression turned eerily similar to that of the imposter. His eyes bulged in surprise as the blood left his face, and a thin sheen of perspiration glistened on his forehead. "What? But- Please excuse me for a moment while I shout at these incompetent fools!"

He spun, robes swishing around him, and stomped towards the warlocks seated behind their crystal balls. Those who spotted his rapidly-reddening face ducked their heads.

The figure on the throne before her swallowed repeatedly and audibly, drawing her attention back to the chamber. "Empress Mercury," he said, speaking very slowly. "W-why would you deny that I am the Duke?"

"I can see your real face," she answered flatly.

He flinched and lowered his eyes even as the hands gripping the throne's armrests started shaking.

She dismissed him as a mere distraction, just like the glowing throne. The way he had been dragging out his sentences would have convinced her of that if she hadn't been certain before. Instead, she focused on the prime suspect for the Duke's disappearance.

The wizard was standing still like a statue, trying to blend into the background. It would have worked much better without the eye-catching gems encrusting his tabard, which glittered in the light from the throne.

Hoping to get some use of her title, she stood straighter and tried to project authority. "Wizard. I, Empress Mercury, demand that you tell me what you did with Duke Libasheshtan!"

His mouth opened briefly, then closed with an audible snap as he fought down his reflexive reaction. His eyebrows settled into a stubborn frown even as his grey beard shook like leaves in the wind. "I will not betray my Liege! I am under no obligation to answer your questions, invader!"

Well, so much for that idea. Perhaps she should start practicing regal poses? In any case, she needed to figure out what had happened quickly. The dwarfs outside wouldn't remain trapped behind her ice forever.

"Your Majesty?" Torian interrupted "I had your wretched minions scry on the Duke again. They can only tell that his current location is too dark to identify it."

Progress, but her warlocks should have already been watching him at all times. She made a displeased noise.

The dwarven wizard whimpered in fright and pressed his back harder against the wall.

"How did you lose him in the first place?" she asked Torian.

"I got Rilgiar to admit that he briefly lost sight of the Duke in the purple smoke," he answered quickly, sounding rather happy that he had found someone to blame. "He insists that he repeated the scrying, but I'm sure he didn't bother when he saw that someone was still sitting on the throne."

That sounded plausible, though she wasn't convinced the other warlock was guilty of not doing his job properly. Scrying again would have shown the room with the imposter if the real Duke was still in it. "Could the Duke have sneaked out?"

"The door only opened once, to let him in. Perhaps there are other exits?" Torian guessed.

"There aren't." She had already scanned the room, but let her gaze pass over the rune-covered walls a second time. Again, she found no hint of secret doors, illusions, or other concealing magic. "Unless…"

The throne's occupant tensed as she strode past him, completely ignoring his presence. There was a sink-like basin in the back of the room, its stone surfaces discoloured and stained with potion remnants. The drain at its bottom looked dark and uninviting, but large enough for a small animal to pass through.

Hesitating only for a moment, she turned to look back at the wizard. "You transformed him into something tiny, didn't you?" she asked.

His face remained so impressively unmoving that she briefly wondered if he had used a spell to paralyse his facial muscles. Nevertheless, he couldn't hide the sudden increase in his heart rate from her visor.

Now certain that she was on the right track, she wondered how she could find the Duke if he had fled through the drain. Wait, rats had a great sense of smell, didn't they? She transported one of the rodents she had brought, dropping it onto her cupped hands. "Torian, I need the spell-eating wards gone. Have the warlocks target my golem body with messages, stop the moment I possess the rat."

"At once, your Majesty."

Both the wizard and the dwarf on the throne jerked in surprise when they heard the sudden, rapid-fire pings of bursting metal from outside.

Unlike them, she knew what was about to happen. She still winced when the last ward broke and a burst of messages filled her head with incomprehensible noise. Quickly, she cast her possession spell to flee from the cacophony.

A tendril of darkness shot from her visor into the rat. There was a moment of disorientation as her perspective switched, and then she felt cold metal under her feet and was looking up at a giant suit of armour. She sniffed the air, borrowing the rodent's superior sense of smell.

The scent of sweat and what she assumed to be dwarfs was thick in the air – no surprise there – and strange, almost chemical odours rose from the basin below. It irritated her nose.

Sneezing, she jumped down into the sink and nosed the drain. The smells didn't improve down there, but she caught a hint of something new and different. Fur, or perhaps some animal she couldn't identify. Not a rat. With a resigned sigh, she jumped into the opening.

A renewed protective dome filled the ritual chamber with its bluish glow, reassuring its occupants. The soldiers were less tense as they swept away debris in small, organised groups, and the wizards were melting ice and regrowing broken crystal without looking over their shoulders every few seconds.

The relative calm ended when one of the soldiers, his head bandaged and his helmet in his lap, raised a shaking finger towards the entrance and shouted "She- she's back! With minions!"

Dwarfs cursed and turned to face the entrance, their brooms and tools clattering to the floor as they went for their weapons.

Camilla flinched as she stared into the twilight that was suddenly filled with crossbows pointed in her direction. Perhaps it hadn't been such a good idea for her blue-haired sister to walk at the front of the group?

Melissa stood frozen like a startled deer in front of the doorway, one leg raised to cross the threshold. She gulped and raised her hands very, very slowly.

"Stand down! False alarm!" a loud, imperious voice echoed from within the chamber. A tall dwarf strode into view, his face covered by a mask-like helmet.

Camilla allowed herself to breathe again as the weapons were lowered. Her gaze flicked over to the dwarven officer and briefly lingered on the dents in the sculpted iron beard jutting out from his chin.

"Last time I checked, the Dark Empress had brightly-glowing red eyes and no wings," the officer continued in an acidic tone of voice.

The soldier who had shouted hung his head. "Lieutenant, I was-"

"Head wound. Impaired vision. I know," the masked dwarf interrupted. "I also know that you are supposed to be resting. Back to the healers, now!" he finished loudly.

"Yes Sir!" the shame-faced dwarf jumped to his feet and saluted, almost hitting his bandages in the process. On wobbly legs, he hurried off towards the right side of the chamber.

"The rest of you, return to your duties!" the Lieutenant said, swinging his arm in a shooing motion.

The soldiers relaxed their posture as they sheathed their weapons and opened their visors. Chatting among each other, they walked back to their duties, glancing occasionally back at the group of fairies.

Camilla didn't really know what to think of their lingering gazes. There was curiosity, but she also saw frowns, wrinkled brows, and some barely-disguised leers. It had to be their uniforms, she decided, thinking back to Kivith's reaction. These dwarfs had some unhealthy issues if they associated a little exposed skin with evil.

"You must be Ambassador Camilla," the officer addressed her, having approached her group while she was thinking. "I am Lieutenant Idenodur, overseeing the local troops in Duke Libasheshtan's stead."

"Pleased to meet you," she replied, inclining her head.

Her sisters did likewise as they said their own greetings, and Kivith bowed deeply, putting one hand on Roselle's shoulder to steady himself.

"Likewise. Please excuse the unfortunate reception, tempers are still running high after the recent attack," Idenodur said.

"Oh, that's all right, no harm done. Um, does he need help?" Camilla said, pointing at the dwarf with the bandaged head. "I can heal."

"Thank you for your offer, but there's no need. Our own healers will tend to him shortly." He tilted his head to the side and focused on Kivith, who was leaning on Roselle for support. "Will your guide require their assistance too?"

The slouching apprentice looked up when he was mentioned, revealing the greenish tone around his nose.

"He isn't sick, he's just a wimp," Tilia said cheerfully. The green-eyes fairy spread her wings and batted them demonstratively, lifting herself off the ground. "All we did was take him flying-"

Kivith's blood-shot eyes flew open, and he whipped his head around so he could glare at her. "We weren't flying!" he protested in an angry, high-pitched whine. "We were falling straight down most of the way! And you almost dropped me!"

"Hey, you almost squeezed my arm off!" Anise grumbled right back. Her upper arm sported a hand-shaped bruise that was almost as red as her hair.

"Well excuse me for being terrified while falling to my death, you crazy-"

"Ahem." The Lieutenant cleared his throat demonstratively. "Aren't you supposed to take them to Mengolin? Quickly?"

"Yes Sir. Of course." Kivith had the good grace to look embarrassed.

"Be on your way, then," the Lieutenant ordered. "Ladies." With a shallow bow towards the fairy sisters, he turned and strode away.

Roselle, still supporting Kivith, was the first of the sisters to actually walk through the ruined doorway. In passing, she brushed with her fingers over its smoothed, worn-away stone.

Moving right behind her, Camilla turned to gape at a huge, blackened area where the ground looked like a pool of uneven, petrified mush. Meltwater was gathering in the depressions, boiling into steam that irritated her nose.

"Did the Dark Empress do all this?" Roselle muttered as her orange-eyed gaze swept over the devastation.

A wizard standing next to a mostly melted ice block put his drinking flask down and clipped it onto his belt. "Nah, we did most of that. Impressed?" he asked cheerfully, smiling at the orange-haired girl. He pointed at the destroyed floor. "Magma fountain. Helped cast the spell myself. We even forced the Dark Empress to flee from the room, you know. She couldn't handle our defences."

Melissa, who had approached as they spoke, said softly "Then what about the wounded?" She was looking at one side of the room, where healers walked through rows of blanket-covered dwarfs who rested on straw mats.

The wizard had to hop off his platform to keep up with the group and landed in a puddle of water that had cascaded down from his perch. He coughed into his fist. "Well, she couldn't defeat our spells, so she stole a bunch of wards to stop us from using them." His expression brightened. "Still, that didn't break the protections we had already put up. Sure stopped her from killing anyone!"

"That's a relief," Camilla said, feeling a little better than she had ever since she had learned about Mercury's attack on the city. The way she treated her civilian prisoners had led the fairy to consider that, perhaps, the Empress wasn't as bad as other Keepers. It was a silly hope, really, and Camilla certainly didn't want her sisters to lecture her about the folly of it again. Still, well, she was glad nobody had died here. For more than the obvious reasons, that is.

Meanwhile, Cerasse had launched herself up in the air to get a better view at the casting diagrams. She whistled. "This is quite the impressive setup you have here, even with the damage. What caused all those pockmark-like burns?"

"Overloaded spell-eater wards," the wizard as said, looking up at the flying fairy. "Same ones she stole from us. We could have fended her off indefinitely without the stupid things."

Anise straightened and swept her gaze over the chamber that was brimming with armoured dwarfs. "Wait, you are telling us she fought her way through all of those soldiers without using magic?"

A soldier who overheard her snorted. "As if! That fiend mostly jumped around like a demented leapfrog trying to stay away from us!"

"Really, she did all that while running away?" Roselle asked, gesturing at the rows of prone, bandaged soldiers. Her wide-eyed expression turned into a bright smile. "You must be so relieved she wasn't fighting you seriously!"

"What? No! I mean, that's not-" the soldier sputtered, his cheeks reddening.

A few of the nearby soldiers shot dark looks at the group of fairies.

"Roselle, come along," Dandel interfered, grabbing her sister by the wrist and yanking her onwards She faced the annoyed dwarfs and bowed apologetically. "Please excuse my sister, she meant no offence."

"Ah, there you are! Took you long enough!" a voice called out from a platform above.

"Master!" Kivith replied, straightening his shoulders.

"And there's my cue to get back to work," the wizard who had trailed after the group said. He ducked into one of the side passages and darted away as the court wizard approached.

Mengolin was wrapped in a thick blanket, and his shoes made sloshing noises with every step, leaving wet footprints on the ground. "Ambassador, Ambassadorial Guard, I wish I could have met you under better circumstances." He shivered and wrung water out of his beard.

Camilla bowed in turn. "Likewise." She took in his soaked robes. "Um, Anise could cast a drying spell on you if you are uncomfortable."

"Later, we are pressed for time," Mengolin declined. "We didn't manage to stall the Dark Empress for as long as we expected, and now she's hot on the Duke's heels. We need to act quickly to foil her plans."

"Of course. What do I need to do?" Camilla asked. She had been wondering for some time why they needed her specifically if they had so many wizards already.

"It will be easiest to show you. Please follow me." He spun so fast that he dislodged a spray of droplets from his clothes. A few of them landed on Kivith.

"Master, what happened to you?" the apprentice asked as he hurried after the older dwarf.

"Tried to capture the body the Dark Empress left behind. She objected."

"W-wait, it's still around?" Kivith stopped abruptly.

"It disappeared after I let go of it," Mengolin said. "We are pretty safe here with the protection dome up again."

"Oh, that's one of the focal points of the ellipse formed by the magic circles, isn't it?" Cerasse asked from above as the group approached a particularly dense knot of diagrams on the floor.

"An astute observation," Mengolin praised the violet-haired fairy.

A dwarf wearing a sleeveless shirt awaited him, powdered stone clinging to his sweaty arms. He put a chisel down and bowed. "Court Wizard, I have just finished the final adjustments."

"Wait, you made a statue of the Dark Empress?" Anise asked, pushing to the front of the crowd to get a closer look at the sculpture.

It wasn't a complete statue, or even a bust, but only a head carved from a block of marble.

"I would have preferred the golem's head, but this should be a close enough likeness for our purposes," Mengolin said after examining the sculpture. He took a small, cloth-wrapped object from a nearby padded box and peeled off its cover. Inside was a glass replica of Mercury's visor, which he affixed onto the carved face.

The sculptor took a step back and examined the effect. "The resemblance is uncanny, if I may say so myself."

"Yes, you did great work. Wouldn't you agree, Ambassador Camilla?" Mengolin said.

The blonde tilted her head to the side. "Well, yes, it's impressive." She paused. "I haven't ever seen her with a scary scowl like that, though."

"Artistic license," Mengolin said. "In any case, we are confident that we got its appearance right. The next part is where you come in, Ambassador. Dugin!"

The artisan approached when he was called, straining from the weight of the large bag he was carrying in front of his belly. He deposited on the workbench with a faint thud.

It slid to the side, and a collection of aquamarine objects that resembled open books spilled out.

"What's that supposed to be?" Anise asked as she circled the collection of strange objects. Her nose wrinkled in disdain as she spotted variants of the Mercury symbol decorating the 'covers'.

"Your sister told us that the Dark Empress once showed her the magical artefact she uses to gather knowledge about things. Those are the closest approximations of its appearance that we could manage based on her descriptions." Mengolin explained. He started flipping the stone computers the right way up so that their glass screens were facing them.

"They all look a little different?" Camilla asked, poking at one that was definitely larger than the real Mercury computer.

"Yes. Please find the one that looks closest to the original. The greater the similarity, the better the spell will work," Mengolin said with an encouraging smile. "Go ahead."

"Oh!" Cerasse said, snipping her fingers. "You are going to use the similarity as a link to target the real one!"

"Indeed," Mengolin confirmed.

"But," the fairy said dubiously, "your copies are just stone and glass. Unless I'm severely underestimating the amount of magic you can bring to bear with your damaged casting diagram, it won't work. According to all the books I have read, to affect the target, the focus needs to be made of the same material."

Mengolin chuckled. "Just watch, you may learn a trick or two," he said jovially. "Ambassador, please stand over here," he said as he pointed at a looping diagram on the floor.

The youngest fairy approached slowly, carrying one of the fake computers under her arm. She stopped in front of the engraved lines and looked at wizard questioningly. "Why me? Wouldn't someone more experienced be better suited to this?"

"Your memories of the artefact make you uniquely suited to forging the link," Mengolin explained. "I will, in fact, be handling the visor personally, since I got the opportunity to see it up close."

"Oh, that makes sense," Camilla said as she stepped into the circle. "I'll do my best!" she promised, her expression growing determined.

"Still can't see this working," Cerasse commented from the back. "The power requirements to make up for the difference-"

"Shush, you," Dandel said. She walked around Camilla once, examining the arcane sigils on the ground before turning to Mengolin. "When do we start?"

"Best get ready immediately," the court wizard stated. "We need to be able to unleash the spell as soon as we get the signal."

Ami's hair whipped into her face as she plummeted into the darkness, the uneven rock walls just out of her reach. She was spinning around as she fell, and her fluttering cloak got tangled around her head.

Irritated, she brushed the cloth away from her eyes. At her current angle, she could see the ledge of the cliff above, and she caught a final glimpse of the minecart she had just been riding.

It was speeding down the rails, its tub still swivelling back upright after it had dumped her into the pit.

She imagined that somewhere, a very smug dwarf was standing next to a lever, and chided herself for not expecting an automatic unloading mechanism.

The bottom of the pit was rapidly approaching, its floor hidden underneath a large pile of loose ore clumps.

They didn't look as if they would soften her landing. Nevertheless, her golem body should survive the impact and regenerate any damage in short order. It certainly wouldn't be as painful as her rat-body being ambushed by a hungry cat earlier.

She grimaced at the brief memory of claws and teeth tearing into her borrowed flesh. Dying while possessing a real, living creature was not an experience she ever wanted to repeat. Poor animal.

There was a loud cracking noise as she smacked into the heap of fist-sized stone chunks. Droplets of water sprayed outwards, and a few clumps of ore came loose and rolled on top of her prone form.

Ow. As it turned out, belly-flopping into a huge pile of ore hurt even when you only had a thin outer layer of glamoured skin. She decided to lay still for a moment while the cracks in her ice shell mended.

"Well, this is embarrassing," Torian's mental voice commented.

"I'm well aware," Ami replied, sounding a little irritated.

Torian didn't answer immediately. In her Keeper sight, he looked over at one of the crystal balls and saw her sprawled out, half-buried form. His eyes widened, and he raised his hands, palms facing outwards. "Oh, no, no, no, this is a misunderstanding, your Majesty!" he said so quickly he would have had to gasp for breath if he hadn't been speaking telepathically. "I was referring to the situation with the Duke!"

"Explain," she said, distracted by repairing her body. Injecting water internally with a spell so the golem wouldn't shrink felt weird.

"We reached the wrong conclusions from his travelling speed," he said, drying the sweat off his brow with his sleeve.

She frowned. While her warlocks were unable to see the Duke in the darkness, they could still scry on him and raise the point of view straight up to the surface to get a rough idea of where he was. He had been covering ground too quickly to be moving on foot.

"He wasn't riding a minecart," Torian continued. "He was a bat. Flying."

A bat. That made sense. A fast, manoeuvrable animal that could travel without needing light that her warlocks could have used to spot it.

"You know where he is?" she asked.

"Yes, we observed him turning back into his real form as he flew into a temple. It's somewhere under surface square D-19."

Her face fell at the prospect of having to deal with another temple. At least, a building would be easier to locate than an individual. She sat up on the shifting ore and quickly entered the coordinates into her computer.

On her visor, a vertical bar appeared, indicating the volume of space that hid her destination.

"I'll remotely scatter colour-coded lights in the target area. Report to me at once when you spot one," she instructed.

Large, rectangular stone plates formed a decorative pattern along the walls of the side passage. Tiny alcoves at head height fitted seamlessly into the design, but the lamps they held were hidden behind bronze covers. Nevertheless, it was bright enough to see just from the glow of the temple on the main road outside.

Ami listened for hints of danger, motionless except for the last traces of black lightning still playing over her newly-possessed golem.

Hammering noises echoed from afar and a minecart rumbled in the distance, but she didn't hear anything moving nearby.

Cautiously, she leaned past the side tunnel's entrance and peeked around the corner.

To her left, multiple branching tunnels opened onto the main passage, which widened to allow the individual minecart tracks to merge. The single remaining track passed under a marble arch formed by a two storey building.

She clenched her teeth at the sight of the structure, fighting down an unnatural urge to flee. Instead, she swallowed and took a closer look to determine if any of her plans were applicable here.

The temple reached from the tunnel's floor to its ceiling and had tall windows. Silvery shutters were slamming closed, though the deep engravings of winged figures that both decorated and weakened the material made their protective value dubious at best.

Clearly, the elegant building with its thin pillars and ivy-like decorations was a place of worship, rather than a fortress. It didn't look as if it could keep out a determined burglar, let alone a Keeper. Of course, the dwarfs had no intentions to keep her out of a temple.

As she scanned the court and the glowing façade for traps, she felt a small tug underneath her feet. She looked down.

An imp wearing a cloak so large that half of it trained over the floor stared up at her. The creature uncrossed her arms and tugged at the fabric again where it was stuck under Ami's boots.

"Ah, yes. Please move to safety for now," she said as she stepped off the piece of cloth.

The imp huffed and twirled, the cloak billowing as it wrapped around her. Nose up in the air, she somersaulted and disappeared in a flare green.

Ami blinked. Imps experienced enough to teleport on their own were a great boon, but she wasn't comfortable thinking about the implications of them occasionally displaying unexpected quirks. In any case, she needed to focus on the Duke. "Is he still in there?"

"Yes, my Empress," Torian confirmed. "We cannot currently observe him directly, which strongly indicates that he hasn't left yet."

That, at least, was good news. Nodding to herself, she stepped into the open and slowly approached the holy building as far as she was comfortable with. Which meant that she stopped at the edge of the courtyard.

She took a deep breath and shouted "Duke Libasheshtan! I, Sailor Mercury, Empress of the Avatar Island, wish to negotiate with you! I'm not going to leave, so just talk to me! Please!"

The Duke being in a temple was problematic, but also predictable. Nevertheless, she wasn't eager to try any of the solutions she had come up with, as she had no idea how far she could escalate without seriously offending the Light. Best to start off with the method that left the temple undamaged.

For a few long seconds, there was no reaction aside from the echo of her voice fading in the tunnels. Then, a curtain on the upper floor moved, right above the top of the archway.

Her hope soared as the door leading out on the balcony opened. Conducting negotiations by shouting across the court of a temple would be awkward, but she was willing to take what she could get.

A dwarf with a long, snow-white beard appeared in the open doorway, leaning on a wooden staff. Not the Duke.

While disappointed, she remained cautiously optimistic. The priest wore a layered robe of white and golden cloth that was far more elaborate than she had come to expect from the rank and file. He wasn't Libasheshtan, but he was clearly a high-ranking member of the clergy. Perhaps he would be acting as go-between?

The dwarf didn't step outside as he met her eyes. "Keeper, Duke Libasheshtan has made it abundantly clear that he wants nothing to do with you," he said with intense disapproval.

"But-"

With his free hand, he traced a large symbol into the air. "Begone, creature of Evil!"

Bright, blinding light filled Ami's vision, and she felt the horrible sensation of holy magic clashing against her. For a nauseating split second, some force was reached inside of her and pulling at every point of her body.

It took her a moment to separate her own revulsion from the disorientation the possessed ice golem was feeling. Almost on reflex, she filled the area with a Shabon Spray fog to protect herself from further attacks and moved to the side.

When she tried to focus on her attacker, she noticed the absence of readouts from her visor that should be projected across her vison.

She blinked in surprise and tapped her earring to dismiss the damaged device, then tapped it again to materialise a replacement.

It was just as non-functional as its predecessor.

She bit her lips. Damage from the priest's spell? Did she need to transform again to fix it?

A sphere of holy radiance tunnelled through the fog towards her, distracting her with waves of revulsion.

She vaulted backwards so she could duck into one of the side passages. Now in cover, she summoned her computer to run diagnostics.

The little palmtop device hummed softly in her grip, but its screen remained dark.

She felt her legs go weak. "Darn it!" she gasped. This couldn't be happening! She needed that computer! How could the dwarfs even have a spell to disable her gear? Had the Light gods figured out how to do it when she was in their temple? But why now? Had she already overstretched the limits of what they were willing to tolerate? But- they had to know she couldn't afford to lose her computer!

That last thought helped her calm down a little before the ramifications of losing access to her computer could cause her to panic. The device was still working; it simply wasn't displaying anything. Some kind of curse?

She raised her hand to cast one of the general-purpose dispels from her library's tomes, but reconsidered at the last moment. Hitting her magical computer with an indiscriminate magic-disrupting dispel sounded like a great way to damage it further. Adjusting her aim, she hit her visor instead.

Arcs of greenish lightning crawled across her vision, dissolving into sparks. Numbers flickered into visibility so briefly that they might just have been wishful thinking, and then the visor was blank again.

She sighed and considered her options. The quick and dirty solution wasn't working, and she couldn't use her broken gear to acquire the data she needed to fix it.

Her eyes narrowed as she snapped the palmtop shut. She could, however, ask the dwarfs what they had done once she had secured Duke Libasheshtan, who was right over there in the temple.

"Torian, where exactly in the building is the Duke hiding?" she asked, peering through her fog.

"Going by viewing angles alone, he seems to be on the right side of the arch on the lower floor," her chief warlock replied after a moment.

Stepping out of cover, she extended her arm and aimed her palm towards the indicated location.

A cone of mist disappeared as her invisibility spell expanded towards the building. When it struck, a semi-circular section of the wall reaching from the ground to the top floor windows simply vanished.

She squinted as light spilled out into the mists. There was an altar far in the back that she hastily averted her eyes from, since it felt like staring directly into the sun. Her gaze slid over the rest of the palace-like sanctum, dismissing the gleaming marble and jewel-encrusted furniture as unimportant. Her attention was firmly on the startled dwarfs whirling to face her.

A few priests were kneeling near pews, eyes widened in surprise. The priest in layered robes from before was descending a staircase leading to the upper floor. Finally, Duke Libasheshtan was staring in her direction, motionless, one arm extended towards a cabinet full of elaborate crystal bottles.

The cone of invisible fog hadn't yet begun to drift apart when he shook off his surprise. He tore his gaze away from her and grabbed the bottles, hurriedly stashing them in a padded bag at his side. As he did, he was walking sideways, moving farther away from the outer walls.

The high-ranking priest on the stairway gestured, sending a wave of silvery light towards the wall. He turned his head to meet Ami's red-glowing eyes, his scowl turning into a smirk as the outer wall shimmered back into visibility.

His smug expression died when a power-armoured golem crashed through the closed window, sailing through the cloud of glass shards, plaster, and broken shutters.

The female-looking intruder crossed half the distance towards Duke Libasheshtan before her feet first touched the ground. She lunged at him, thrusting the carpet backwards with her legs.

"Impossible!" one of the priests shrieked, stumbling as the fabric under his feet jerked.

Teeth bared, Duke Libasheshtan backpedalled and reached for his sword.

An armoured hand blurred towards his collar, only to come to a sudden stop with a loud clang.

He suddenly had a great view of the intruder slamming into an amber-coloured wall of light so hard that her fingers bent the wrong way before she bounced off. Gratefully, he inclined his head towards the priest in layered robes, whose raised staff was glowing in the same colour as the barrier.

The golem started raining lightning-quick punches onto the force field, their ringing impacts echoing through the building and drowning out the new instructions Ami was shouting at her.

She wished the golem would turn and look at her through the ragged hole where the window had been. In the back, she could see the altar radiating the same amber glow as the barrier that split the room into two parts. It certainly wouldn't fall before the armour's gem reserves were all used up.

She tossed a small ball of ice at the golem's back to get its attention just when the high-ranking priest gestured with his free hand.

Some of the golden wind chimes hanging from the ceiling came loose. Like pen-sized javelins, they shot towards the golem and burrowed into its armour, sticking out of it like bristles.

An instant later, the animated ice sculpture toppled sideways, paralyzed.

Ami hung her head in disappointment. That had been her plan with the least amount of collateral damage, but, to be honest, she hadn't really expected it to succeed. Apparently, she would have to quite literally flush the Duke out. As she prepared to freeze over all openings that would prevent her from flooding the building, she tried to spot him through the broken window.

"Your Majesty," Torian contacted her, "the Duke is trying to escape through the back door!"

Ami felt a jolt of excitement, and her eyes snapped to the area behind the arch while her Keeper sight focused on her chief warlock. "Show me!"

"Here," the chief warlock said, pointing at a crystal ball. "Note the empty invisibility potion on the ground."

That sounded as if her visor would be really helpful right now, but she could manage without it. Immediately, she remotely projected a Shabon Spray mist behind the temple, as close to it as she could.

Instead of the mist parting around a dwarf-shaped void, something moving faster than an arrow cut a straight lane through the expanding banks of fog.

"He's no longer in the courtyard!" Torian told her, leaning over his crystal ball. "He must have ingested more than one type of potion," he speculated.

She clenched her fists in frustration. She had been so close! "Track him! Use the colours to guide me," she ordered as she cast a differently-coloured light spell into each of the three tunnels leading away from the temple.

"Understood. Pink," Torian replied.

The teleport-capable imp with the oversized cloak appeared at her side, ready to be possessed so she could get past the temple quickly.

She would not let the Duke escape, not when he was this close. No matter how fast or invisible he was.

The tunnel Ami had been following opened up into larger caverns lined with buildings, not unlike a main street in a surface city. There was even rain in the form of a mild drizzle that dripped down from clouds of steam that gathered under the ceiling.

Ami didn't mind the water at all, as it felt refreshing in the sweltering heat. There were narrow streams of glowing magma trickling down the walls, serving as a kind of street light.

In her opinion, their decorative value wasn't worth the detrimental effects on the room climate. She swept her gaze over the cranes, various piles of ore, and crates of finished metals that cluttered the sides of the road, and slightly adjusted her assessment. If the magma had already been pumped up here to heat forges and furnaces, then it made sense to get the most out of it before it cooled down.

A shirtless dwarven worker didn't hear her approach with all the hammering and rumbling that echoed through the district. When he finally spotted her, he dived behind the minecart he had been pushing and waited until she had dashed past.

Not all of the civilians who noticed her fled. A group of them were pouring molten metal out of a huge crucible, and they tracked her nervously with their eyes as she hopped over a few crates that jutted into the road and ran past.

That was some courage and dedication to duty she could admire, particularly since it was a duty that didn't involve getting in her way. She spotted a smith move so that his anvil was between him and her, but he didn't stop hammering the bluish metal before him. Adamantine! He was working adamantine! If only she had the time to observe, or at least had her visor to record this!

"Your Majesty, you need to veer left into the next alley, then to the right, then up the stairs onto the bridge," Torian directed her.

She almost overlooked the indicated intersection amidst all the crates, support pillars, and forge equipment. Another reason to miss her visor. She couldn't be sure there weren't traps waiting for her. Just because the civilians were leaving her alone didn't mean that guards had given up on stopping her.

A dwarven woman carrying an amphora-like pot spotted her as she rounded the corner, screamed, and ducked into a hallway.

Case in point, Ami hadn't noticed her arrive. At least up on the bridge Torian had guided her onto she had a better field of view of the twisting maze below. She seemed to be moving towards the edge of the metalworking district.

When she was past the middle of the bridge, her chief warlock spoke up again. "Now jump off, onto that pile of tiles that reaches almost up to the railing. Yes, that one," he said. "Oh, and the Duke's speed boost must have worn off. You are catching up to him," he informed her cheerfully.

The stack of tiles wobbled and toppled as soon as her feet touched it.

With a yelp, she waved her arms to keep her balance and tried to ride the avalanche of metal squares.

It worked for almost a second, but then the soldier who had been lying in ambush whipped a chain around her legs and yanked.

She lost the fight against gravity and fell right onto the pile of shifting squares. Immediately, she rolled sideways to avoid tiles from another stack falling onto her.

Amidst the clanging of metal plating, she almost missed her attacker shouting "Now!"

Behind her, further up the incline, a minecart started rolling in her direction. Its driver's mustache was waving in the wind as the vehicle hurtled toward her, and his teeth were bared in a manic grin.

He had a passenger, a soldier who was pointing a lance at her as if he was a charging knight.

Dodge? She would have to rise and get rid of the chain draped around her legs first. On the other hand, she was lying on a pile of rather thick tiles.

Acting quickly, she propped one up against the ground like a shield and sat behind it.

The lance screeched horribly as it slid over the angled metal. An instant later, the vehicle reached it.

She wasn't holding her shield vertically like a wall, but inclined at a shallow angle.

Instead of slamming into the plate with all of its momentum, the minecart drove over it as if it was ramp, barely losing speed.

The two soldiers screamed in surprise as they went sailing through the air.

With a casual gesture, she tossed the heavy plate aside and stared at the remaining soldier.

Mouth wide open, he stared at her, then at the cart disappearing down the incline, then at her again. He was still gaping in disbelief when Ami stood up, shook the chain off, and resumed sprinting after the Duke.

She was rather irritated that the dwarfs had figured out that a few attackers could slow her down almost as much as large groups.

After running for a few hundred metres, the decorations around her became more elaborate and occasionally featured angels.

She slowed her step, her worry about wards she couldn't detect increasing. "Torian, the imagery on the walls is getting more religious. Am I approaching another temple?"

"It's just a cemetery. Well, noble tombs and vaults, really. Pompous, lots of gold and silver. Guess they don't want to get separated from their wealth even in death."

"Why would he flee down there?" she wondered.

"We are still checking," Torian replied. "At a guess, he expects that door up ahead to stop you."

Cogwheels rattled somewhere inside the walls as a truly massive metal door, as thick as her forearm was long, slid across the tunnel. It was engraved with so many anti-evil wards that she could feel them from a distance.

She felt as if she was pushing through thick syrup as she approached the obstacle, trying to get through before it could close completely. With a wave of her hand, she put an ice block into the narrowing gap between it and the wall.

It cracked and splintered, and hissing steam rose where the ice touched the white-hot, melting wards. Still, it slowed the groaning mechanism down a little.

With the wards disintegrating, she recovered her full speed just in time to squeeze sideways through the gap between wall and door.

It slammed shut behind her with a loud thud, and there wasn't even a trap waiting for her.

Taking a moment to place some lights for her warlocks, she surveyed the tunnel before her.

On both sides were vault doors with family crests, inlaid with gold and silver. Statues lined the way, and there were prayers for the dead inscribed on some of the arches.

She ignored those, as she could hear the echo of running footsteps. "Duke Libasheshtan, please wait!" she shouted, on the off chance he would listen.

"Emergency! There's a hero gate down there!" Torian shouted suddenly. "Check crystal ball nine!"

Her heart skipped a beat. An escape route! Now his decision to come here made sense. Hurriedly, she followed his footsteps and scattered light spells as she ran.

A dim blue glow appeared near the gateway-like arch set into the wall.

There! Target acquired! Was the Duke carrying a magical pick? If so, a simple block of ice wouldn't stop him. She needed something he couldn't dig through quickly. Rubble!

Her mind focused on the pattern of the cave-in spell. She felt a moment of regret for the priceless artwork she was accepting as collateral damage, and then thunder rolled through the tunnels.

The ceiling above the hero gate cracked and collapsed, burying the exit underneath tons of loose debris.

"Oh, that took the wind out of his sails!" Torian commented. "He was close enough to get knocked on his arse by the displaced air. I can see his silhouette as a void in the dust cloud!"

"Good." She smiled at the thought of finally being able to catch him.

"Oh, now he is panicking. Looks like he's trying to hide in one of the tombs."

A heavy door slammed shut just ahead.

Dust sprayed around her feet as she skidded to a halt in front of the building in question. It looked fairly recent, even stained with dirt from the cave-in.

She read the memorial plate set into the wall. "Duke Libasheshtan? If you don't come out, I'll have to damage your family's tomb!"

There was no answer.

With a sigh, she formed a crowbar with her production spell and applied the strength of her golem body.

Unable to bear the strain, the locking mechanism tore apart, and the door swung open. The room before her was dark, but she could see the shadow of a sarcophagus in one corner.

Wary of traps, she placed dozens of light spells in a random pattern so she would hit every room of the building.

"He's still invisible," Torian warned her. "He went down a secret hatch under the carpet in the next room."

"Any other exits?" she asked as she stepped through the door, briefly examining the swords on dispay on the walls. She added Shabon Spray fog to the lights to counter the invisibility.

"None. He's trapped like a rat," the warlock said with obvious relish.

She found the carpet he had mentioned and pushed it aside. Even knowing there was a hatch, she had to squat down and brush with her fingers over the ground to spot its edges.

A tiny section clicked as she put pressure on it.

The sound of a bottle smashing against the wall came from below.

"Oh, this is interesting. He threw a potion that is sucking up your mist," Torian said.

She smiled at the thought of the Duke preparing the battlefield for a final stand. It meant he couldn't get away. She pushed a little harder, and the hatch swung open. Hesitating only for a moment, she jumped down.

"Duke Libasheshtan? It's over. Just come quietly, please," she pleaded, ready to defend herself against his last desperate attack.

Above her, the spring-powered hatch closed.

She raised her hand and froze it in place. "The only exit is sealed shut. You cannot sneak past me. I just want to talk to you, so please cooperate."

"You haven't won. You can't find me before I can kill myself," the Duke said suddenly, his voice echoing so strangely she couldn't track its source.

"N-no! Don't do that!" She blurted out, freezing in place. She hadn't really expected him to take himself hostage. "Please don't do anything rash! I mean no harm."

Where exactly was he hiding? The only movement was the green stain on the wall sucking up the last vestiges of her fog. If only her visor was working!

"Do anything to find me and I'm dead! Understood?" he said, his voice still echoing from all sides.

"Yes," she replied. Of course, the Duke had no way to know she was in constant mental communication with her warlocks. "Torian, use scrying to triangulate his exact position and tell me," she ordered. "I need the best possible precision."

"Just a moment. Hmm. Yes. Imagine a straight line between the wide end of the emerald-studded sarcophagus and the right foot of the statue on the wall. Imagine a second line between you and the garish double-headed axe on the wall. He's standing right on their intersection."

"Are you absolutely sure?" she verified.

"To about a hand's span close, yes,"

That was good enough for her. Aiming for the average dwarf's height, she brought a Shabon Spray Freezing from her storage and launched it at the indicated location.

The stream of bubbles travelled about a finger's length after appearing before it collided with something invisible and expanded into a block of ice.

The Duke let out a surprised hiss and flickered back into visibility, his enchantment broken. Only his head was poking out from the ice, leaving his limbs immobilised.

"I'm sorry for that," she said as she finally got to look at him. She didn't feel too much remorse for trapping him like that though, since he had obviously not been preparing to commit suicide.

With an open potion bottle in his left hand and and a sword in his right, he looked ready to lunge at her. "Well, that didn't work," he said, his voice still producing the odd echoes. "Bah. Keeper, start talking. You finally have your captive audience. Not that it will change anything."

"But you haven't even heard yet what I'm offering," she said as she stepped towards him. "You want me gone, I don't want to be here-"

Her vision went black as her golem died. There was a wrenching sensation, and she felt as if she was burning up from the inside. When the room stopped spinning around her, she was sprawled out on the cold ground.

In her real body.

The Duke laughed. "You already lost. This room is an adamantine box, and it just finished sealing."

Last edited: May 6, 2017

Adamantine

Lying on the floor, Ami went rigid as she processed the Duke's words. Her heartbeat quickened. She couldn't be trapped in an inescapable prison fit to hold even a dark god, could she?

Unwilling to take his word for it, she reached for her dungeon heart.

Nothing. She couldn't access its magic, nor see into her dungeon, nor feel any kind of connection to the creatures that served her at all. The knowledge held in her libraries had disappeared just like her ability to move objects into storage. She couldn't even use her Keeper senses on the room she was in.

Shivering despite the warmth of the floor, she pushed herself up. It took a little more effort than she was used to, and she looked down at herself once she was in a sitting position. Oh, she was in civilian form, wearing one of the corruption-resistant outfits based on the fairies' uniforms.

She pulled her arms close to her chest and started rocking in place. If the adamantine was keeping away even the magic she needed to sustain her transformation, then how was she ever going to free herself? Was she completely cut off from the outside world? Wait, something didn't fit.

"How…?" she muttered softly.

Duke Libasheshtan had been watching her with a satisfied grin, and his expression brightened even further. Completely misinterpreting her question, he answered "Oh, it wasn't all that difficult," he said. "A clever mechanism to pour molten adamantine onto the trapdoor. You actually helped it harden faster when you tried to lock me in." His eyes flicked briefly towards the block of ice clinging to the ceiling.

Ami raised her head to look at him, surprised by his explanation. If only he had been that cooperative where negotiations were concerned. "That's, um, nice to know, but not really what I was wondering about," she said.

In fact, she didn't know how she was still alive. If the adamantine box blocked everything, then she should be cut off from her soul and dead. Either adamantine wasn't as impenetrable as she believed, or there was some weakness in the prison that she could exploit.

She turned to glance at the dead golem lying behind her on the floor.

It looked like an inert ice statue, its glamoured skin having dissolved along with its Sailor Mercury uniform. In contrast, the light spells underneath the ceiling that didn't need an external mana source were still working.

She dismissed the possibility of a hole in the prison. No matter how small it was, mana would have been able to flow in. It seemed more likely that adamantine had some unknown properties. Could she get more answers out of the Duke?

For someone stuck to his neck in ice and imprisoned with a Keeper in an adamantine box, he looked surprisingly smug and satisfied. Judging from his stance, he had been preparing to attack her the moment she appeared in her real body. Despite his plan failing, he didn't look afraid.

She got to her feet. "Duke Libasheshtan, shouldn't you be more worried? You are trapped in here too, and our air supply won't last forever." Which meant she was on a time limit. She didn't know how to determinate exactly how long she had, but the room was several meters wide and deep, so she was at least not in immediate danger.

"My death is acceptable if it keeps my people safe from you," he said. "Which it will, since there is no way for you to get out," he added smugly.

"But, that's completely unnecessary!" she protested, horrified. "I wasn't going to attack. I came here to ask for a truce so that I could leave. With trains and access to the ocean, I could move to an iceberg. You want me gone from your territory, and I don't want to stay," she explained.

"Then you obviously shouldn't have come here in the first place, Empress," the Duke answered.

"I had no choice," she said, lowering her head. "There was no time and no way to move all the people I'm responsible for, and I didn't have any reliable defences against undead sea monsters either."

"And you conveniently acquired some now that you are losing? A likely story. Empress, just how gullible do you think we are?"

"It's the truth!" she protested. Torian had only recently developed his mass undead control spell.

"Even if I believed your tale, stopping you would still be worth almost any sacrifice. You are simply too dangerous to let live. I don't know how you have made the Avatar and the Light reluctant to oppose you directly, but that's a power no Keeper can be allowed to have!"

She hesitated only for a moment. "They leave me alone because I'm not evil!" There wasn't really any point in trying to keep that secret from him. If she managed to convince him, then he would have no reason to tell her enemies. If she didn't, well, she probably couldn't get out of here alive without his help.

A quiet chuckle came from the Duke, his black beard bobbing as it grew louder and louder. He managed to stop himself before it turned into full blown laughter. "That's all you can come up with? I must say, watching a Keeper realise there's no way out and getting increasingly desperate is proving to be as amusing as I hoped it would be. A fine way to spend one's final hours."

"But-"

"In fact, I am going to use this unique opportunity to the fullest and gloat until you finally snap and start torturing me or something," he continued in a cheerful voice.

"I wouldn't-" she protested, frustrated that he seemed determined to martyr himself.

The immobilised dwarf carelessly interrupted her. "Are you, for example, aware that your side is slowly but surely losing?"

"I know my situation doesn't look very good right now…" she admitted reluctantly.

"Not just you. I meant Keepers, Dark Gods, Evil in general."

She blinked rapidly, not sure what to say. That sounded too good to be true.

"You don't believe me? I swear on my honour that it is true. We dwarfs have been working on making this happen ever since the Light first blessed our ancestors with the means to thrive underground," he said, his voice booming with pride.

Not yet sure whether to believe him, she was nevertheless eager to hear more. "Could you elaborate on that, please?"

"With pleasure. You would have to get violent to stop me from talking," he confirmed. "Let's start with the basics. Do you know where the foundation of the Underworld's is?"

She shook her head. "I wasn't aware it had one." Besides, Jadeite's attempts to map that place had never gone anywhere.

"Well, it's right here, about a mile or two straight down," the Duke said.

Involuntarily, she looked at the floor. "You mean the remains of the dark god sealed in adamantine?"

The Duke's eyes widened in surprise, but he nodded. "So you know about that already. Yes, you are correct. That decomposing corpse is the origin of the Underworld; the dark heart that keeps it working."

Conflicting information had kept her from making that connection. "But I thought it was sealed away?"

"If only! The adamantine covers it like a blanket, forming a roughly bowl-shaped shell that's open at the bottom. The dark power trapped underneath creates a chaotic hell that protrudes down into the magma. Currents carry it along, stretching it out into a labyrinth of diluted tendrils. Fortunately, the conditions down there make that labyrinth impossible to traverse, so its worst parts remain unreachable. Less fortunately, some parts eventually rise back to the planet's crust, where their dark power corrupts their surroundings and births monsters."

Ami nodded slowly, thinking of Metallia's power animating random objects. So far, this sounded fairly believable. "And you are working on closing the opening?" she asked, interested despite her need to search for a way out.

"No, we can't dig that deep because the bedrock doesn't support the pressure. We simply collect and use the filtered mana that seeps through the adamantine."

A jolt of excitement went through her body, and she leaned forward eagerly. "Adamantine can let magic through?"

"That's what I just said." He paused and raised an eyebrow. "Not yours though, so you can wipe that hopeful expression off your face. It's a divine material, it's meant to stop everything tainted by evil. There's no way anything touched by a dungeon heart can get through."

She frowned. "But somehow, the magic of an actual dark god can?" she asked sceptically.

The Duke's shook his head as much as the ice let him. "No, what gets through is mana that has changed so much during random decay that no trace of its original structure, intent, guidance, or allegiance remains."

"I see," she answered thoughtfully. Her own mana, handled by the dungeon heart, apparently failed to meet those conditions. Perhaps there was unaligned ambient magic permitted into this prison that she could draw in for her own use?

"Anyway, there's a considerable amount of free power rising from below that we put to good uses, such as lighting, temperature regulation, healing, transport, food production, and crafting." He grinned at her expectantly.

She felt a little lost. While she now knew that the dwarfs powered their city with a decaying dark god – not something she had expected, really – she still had no idea which conclusion the Duke was obviously expecting her to reach. "I don't quite follow how this would lead to the side of Evil losing?" she asked hesitantly.

The Duke's grin waned. "I thought that should be obvious. Dark gods gain power from causing evil and lose power from causing good, even if it's unintentional. Using that dead abomination to improve lives, thwart evil, and create great works permanently weakens it, and with it the Underworld!"

She blinked. There was a giant, glaring problem with that explanation. "Shouldn't all the misery and suffering created by the Underworld empower it even more, then?"

Unperturbed, the Duke smiled. "Yes, but, fortunately, evil is self-defeating." He chuckled. "To be more precise, the other dark gods ruin everything. As usual. Only the last god involved reaps the spoils."

She considered her own visits to the Underworld, where every aspect of society and even the unnatural terrain was shaped according to the whims of dark gods. "The dark pantheon claims all the credit," she concluded, her mood improving a little.

He nodded. "And thus, the Underworld withers while adamantine grows. You must have noticed that the more magical evil monsters have become rarer and rarer over the centuries. When was the last time you saw a naturally-occurring horde of more than fifty demonspawn?"

"I'm only fifteen," she replied, still thinking through the implications.

The Duke tilted his head to the side. "Centuries?"

"Years!" she protested, surprised.

"Seriously?" His brow furrowed as he looked her up and down silently for several seconds. "You are as old as you look? If that's the truth, your Majesty, then you are way too young to wear something like that," he said with obvious disapproval.

She felt her cheeks heat up and crossed her arms. "It's a recoloured fairy uniform. Which is used by Light side forces," she defended herself. "It's the most respectable outfit I can wear without the dungeon's Corruption making embarrassing changes."

"In other words, not respectable at all," he replied, obviously enjoying her discomfort.

She turned away from him, unwilling to discuss her choice of attire when she had much more pressing problems. Not that changing into her senshi uniform was a bad idea at all. If adamantine was permeable to non-evil magic, then she definitely should try transforming.

Raising one hand into the air, she called out "Mercury power, make up!"

Her transformation pen appeared, but it remained inactive between her fingers. Insufficient power. Apparently, just having a dungeon heart was enough to contaminate her senshi magic so it couldn't pass through the adamantine.

"Was that supposed to do anything?" the sardonic voice of the Duke asked from behind her after a few seconds.

With a sigh, she lowered her arm and considered her transformation pen for a moment before dismissing it. If her personal artefacts still worked, then her computer should also –

She concentrated, feeling a mild drain before a reassuring weight appeared in her hand. With a relieved breath, she flipped the device open. Despite having used it frequently in civilian form, she had been a little worried there.

To her even greater relief, the screen was bright and functional. Whatever had been interfering with it couldn't make it through the adamantine, at least not while staying a finished and functional spell.

The Duke craned his head and tried to look at the screen. "Oh, is that the thing that reveals secrets to you? Not that knowledge will get you out of here."

"I have to try anyway," she answered, staring at the screen. "Actually, how did you disable it earlier?" Provided she managed to escape from here, she needed to keep that from happening again.

"Simplicity itself," he explained. "A mere sympathetic link to its appearance to replace it with an illusion was enough to confound the Dark Empress. Fairly basic magic, but hard to get rid of with the power of the ritual chamber backing it. Which, by the way, also protected its casters from any retribution you could have brought to bear at range."

She hung her head. "I could have simply changed the screen's appearance with some dirt if I had known how it worked," she muttered, more to herself.

The Duke gaped at her. "But- That couldn't have- could it?" he asked before falling quiet, leaving her to her work.

In the ensuing silence, she typed away at her computer, trying to get a better read on her situation.

The link to her dungeon heart was missing completely, to her surprise and worry. Didn't she need it to stay alive? Then again, underlings had minion bonds too, and they suffered no ill effects when a dungeon heart was destroyed.

Her soul had to remain connected to her by some other mechanism. Which, when she considered the problem from a different angle, made a certain amount of sense. The attraction exerted by the soul on a dungeon keeper's body was so great that merely approaching the site of a lost dungeon heart would lead to being sucked into the dark realm. Forging a direct magical link to the source of said attraction - well, the mental image it brought to mind was a dungeon heart with Usagi's face, the connection as a straw, and the Keeper as a ball of runny ice cream.

Could it be that the dungeon heart was actually shielding the body from the soul? She had so many new questions. This imprisonment would actually be a wonderful experiment if only she didn't have to worry about surviving it.

Deciding that the more metaphysical mysteries had to wait until later, she focused on the walls. Even superficial scans revealed that there was metal hidden underneath a thin layer of stone.

Behind her, the Duke swallowed audibly as she plucked an ornamental double axe off the wall.

Even using both hands, the weapon was too heavy for her to easily swing. She spun in a half circle to make it pick up speed before slamming it against the wall.

The axe bounced off hard enough to jump from her grip. Ringing, it dropped to the ground amidst a spray of pulverised stone and skidded away.

She briefly shook her aching fingers and then brushed over the gash she had made. With a bit of effort, she managed to pry away more of the cracked stone camouflaging the blue-gleaming adamantine underneath.

Her computer told her that the layer was very thin, roughly three millimetres thick, and that her blow hadn't affected it at all.

She turned towards the Duke. "Do you know why my equipment can suddenly measure the adamantine's thickness? I have never been able to do that before."

"Of course you couldn't. It is a holy metal, the power of a dead god of Light in physical form. It may not be alive, but it has purpose. It thwarts evil like you to the best of its abilities."

"And now it can tell that I'm not evil?" she asked, perking up.

He snorted. "Don't be ridiculous. It's probably your artefact that doesn't register as evil now that it's not under the influence of a dungeon heart."

"But- oh, never mind." She couldn't really disagree with her computer's lack of evilness. She kicked at the damaged wall in frustration, and a palm-sized piece of stone flaked off.

The gleaming adamantine underneath it wasn't as smooth as she had expected. Dense, precise lines formed elaborate wards that reminded her of magnified circuitry.

The complexity of what she was seeing baffled her. "You can't have had the time to make all this!" she gasped.

"Oh, this trap wasn't for you originally," the Duke offered. "Keeper Bartholomeus died in here. We only had to bring it through the hero gate and reassemble it."

She nodded in comprehension. "So it can be opened!" she concluded. For a moment she paused to focus all of her computer's sensors on the trapped dwarf. She didn't want to miss any sign he was lying when he answered her next question. "Can you open it?"

He shook his head. "No. Even if I could and was willing to, I would still fail because the adamantine would resist me trying to free a Keeper." His smile turned downright nasty. "That also means your minions won't be able to coerce anyone into letting you out. There is no hope for you."

He just had to remind her that the people back at her dungeon were in danger too. Clenching her teeth, she wished she knew what was happening back there. Hopefully, Jadeite and the others wouldn't try anything reckless.

The readings on her screen indicated that the padding of the Duke's armour kept him warm under the ice, and there was no shivering to obscure his body's involuntary reactions. There were no indications that he had been less than truthful, either.

"Darn it!" Never mind this being her first attempt at using her computer as a lie detector, the results made too much sense. One didn't leave the means to escape in a prisoner's cell. Forcing aside her increasing worry, she studied the incredibly intricate wards again.

Too much work had gone into them for them to be unimportant, even if she didn't know what they did. Something with space? Her computer couldn't detect anything beyond the adamantine, weirdly enough.

"So, what are those wards for if the adamantine is indestructible?" she asked.

"To stop you from teleporting out, of course. Adamantine can stop many things, but just going around it isn't one of them."

Her breath quickened. A way out! She only needed to find a weakness in the wards and she could free herself! Or, to be more precise, she could get a message about the weakness out to someone who could retrieve her. Being in civilian form effectively stopped her from using her self-teleport.

With a smile, she turned to the Duke. "I can't help but notice that you are being surprisingly helpful."

"Respect for your title, Empress," he grumbled. "Besides, I quite enjoy rubbing in all the reasons why you will never make it out of here alive."

"You aren't worried at all that I will find a way to bypass those wards?" she asked, tilting her head to the side.

"No. They were designed by the Light and inscribed into indestructible adamantine. There is not even a tiny chance that they will fail," he said confidently.

She blinked. "I thought you didn't trust the Light?"

"Watch your words, Keeper!" Duke Libasheshtan bellowed, glowering at her. "I have complete faith in the Light's abilities!"

She shrunk back from the dwarf's furious gaze. "But, it doesn't look like it to me," she hurried to explain. "I mean, it was pretty clear that the Avatar didn't want you to fight me, but you didn't listen."

"That's just being aware of the Light's limitations," the Duke answered, and his red face returned to a healthier colour. "The Light gods are unsurpassed when it comes to creation, nurture, improvement, healing and protection. However, causing destruction is against Their nature, which makes them prioritise defence over offence. Sometimes unwisely so."

"And you thought this was one of those times," she said, letting out a long breath.

"The results speak for themselves. You are here, defeated, while waiting would have let you build up your forces," he pointed out.

"Defeating me wasn't even their objective," she protested. She narrowed her eyes at him. "Also, I'm not ready to give up just yet."

"The adamantine doesn't care, and neither do the wards. Also, it is my great joy to inform you that shielding and protecting an area from travel does fall under the Light's strengths. Nobody is getting in or out of here without being able to work adamantine."

"Which you obviously won't tell me how to do," she said with a sigh.

"On the contrary."

"What?" She stared at him with wide eyes, certain she had misheard him.

He nodded jovially. "Oh, yes. Since the knowledge is completely useless to someone like you, it will simply make my victory so much sweeter."

"I'm listening," she replied in a flat voice.

"Good. First, you need to heat the metal – its melting point is a little higher than that of iron – not that this will have any effect unless the other conditions are also met."

She nodded, taking notes. Difficult in her current position, but not impossible. If she could come up with a way to collect the ambient mana, she could shape it into a simple spell to heat up a small spot of the wall. She didn't need more than a tiny hole.

"Second, you need a priest to infuse the adamantine with holy power, giving it back a semblance of the life it once had," the Duke continued, his smile widening as she paled.

Her shoulders slumped. There was no way for her to do that. Unless… she looked up so abruptly that she startled the Duke.

"What does it take to become an acolyte?"

Mouth agape, he stared at her for almost half a minute. "You know what? I'm not even going to dignify that kind of insanity with an answer. Moving right on. The next step is anointing the metal with some blood." Remembering that it was a Keeper he was talking to, he hurried to clarify "and no cheating, it needs to be from the person who works the adamantine."

That sounded easy enough, provided she could clear the previous obstacles. For only making a tiny hole, she wouldn't need much.

"Now, the adamantine will judge you. If you and your intentions are good, it becomes as malleable as ordinary metal to you. As you can see, that's yet another impossible step," he concluded triumphantly.

For a regular Keeper, certainly. Without the dungeon heart tainting her, she felt she could pass the test. Unless the adamantine objected to some of her more questionable actions in the recent past. Best not to dwell on that now.

"Is that everything that's required?" she asked in a thoughtful voice. "I was expecting there to be some skill barrier, like applying a complicated procedure with little margin of error."

"Great skill is required to actually forge something worthwhile, as heated adamantine is rather sticky," he answered obligingly. "Anyone less than a master smith would just waste-"

The room jolted, making the frozen dwarf sway. The emerald-studded sarcophagus in the corner jumped, its lid raising a finger's breadth before slamming shut again.

"What was that?" she asked, startled. "Are your men moving the room?"

"No, they won't do anything to it until they have quite thoroughly verified that you are dead," he replied as he looked around. "This must be your minions trying something stupid and futile."

She placed her ear against the wall. Only the youma and Jadeite would be able to teleport near here. "Hello? Can you hear me?" she shouted, worried for their safety. Tiger in particular might have followed her despite the danger.

Faint rumbling reached her, and occasionally masonry cracked or rock groaned. No voices at all, even when the room shuddered again. It didn't sound as if any living being was nearby.

"It sounds a little like a very slow cave-in," she reported to the Duke. "Was there perhaps a plan to bury this trap after it had gone off?"

He shook his head. "Why? That would be pointless. We don't get any earthquakes here either."

She considered more possibilities until she remembered something important. "Actually, what is happening to all the mana that can't reach me?" she asked in a shaky voice.

The Duke looked surprised at her tone. "It hits the adamantine and gets stuck outside, obviously."

"That's what I was afraid of," she answered. "Did you consider how dangerous that is?" When Snyder had first made wards to stop her sailor uniform from appearing on her underlings, the blocked magic had stuck around her dungeon heart and produced chaotic results.

He didn't share her apprehension. "Nothing to worry about. It's merely more power for the city's infrastructure, which will consume it just like the mana rising from below."

"That's even worse!" she blurted out.

"What, contributing something beneficial to society during your last moments?" he said, winking.

She wasn't in a mood for jokes. "Flooding your city with mana that's tainted by a dungeon heart, mixed with dark magic from my patron deity, and containing all the Corruption that can't reach me in here!" she elaborated.

He scoffed. "A drop in the ocean, you mean. With all the power we harvest from below, yours will be so diluted by the point it hits the wards that nobody will notice anything. It's not an issue."

"I- I don't think you realise how much mana I can draw upon," she answered. She wasn't boasting, but saying that still felt awkward.

"Your attempts at unsettling me are pointless. I can't help you get out, so you can stop pretending to be concerned for my citizens," he said. "Unless you are simply trying to make me miserable?"

"No! But you can't deny that something strange is happening outside!"

As if on cue, the room shook again.

"I still believe that it is merely a doomed rescue attempt," the Duke said, rolling his eyes.

"And I have yet another reason to break out of here fast," she replied. Her fingers danced over the keyboard, bringing up arcane diagrams. She would draw one of those right now so it could collect and concentrate ambient mana while she worked. She wouldn't get out without being able to cast spells.

Last edited: Jun 2, 2017

Trapped (first half)

Sparks flew from the red-hot iron as the hammer struck it repeatedly, some of them travelling far enough to strike the smith's leather apron. The muscular, copper-skinned dwarf paused suddenly and raised his head. With a frown, he rested his hammer on the anvil and pulled down the face-wrap that kept his long, bushy beard out of the way. "Hey Rom, are you hearing that too?"

Across the smithy, right next to a rack full of almost-finished swords, a dwarf so young his beard was barely more than a brown fuzz looked up from his work. The apprentice lifted the knife he was sharpening off the pedal-driven whetstone in front of him. Without the grinding noise, the smithy was much quieter, and he turned his head left and right as he listened. "Some kind of sizzling, yes?" he asked after a moment. He looked down, at the worn stone floor covered in filings. "Below?"

"It's coming from the pumps," his master said, his expression darkening.

"Oh," Rom said in a small voice. The sweat that formed on his brow had nothing to do with the heat in the room. He knew there were pipes that conducted pressurized magma passing below.

"It sounds almost like a boiling kettle," the master smith continued, still frowning. He walked out the open front door, gesturing at his apprentice to follow. "Come, give me a hand here!"

Rom obediently hurried after him. Outside, he found the old dwarf pulling at the ring attached to an iron hatch in the front yard's floor.

With combined efforts, they managed to pull it open. Warm, humid air blew into their faces from the square maintenance shaft.

"Not good. Everything should be dry down there," the smith growled over the now clearly audible sizzling and dripping noises. "Those weird tremors from earlier must have caused a leak somewhere." He crouched and reached for the ladder.

"Wait!" Rom called out. "I'll go! I learned a spell to protect myself from the heat from my previous master," he said.

"Are you sure?" the older dwarf asked, a hint of worry in his bronze eyes as he looked at his apprentice.

"Yes, it's going to be safer for me than for you," Rom said. "If there is boiling steam down there, I'll merely get wet while you, well…"

The smith stared at him for a moment before he nodded cleared the way. "If you insist. Don't try to fix anything, just find the problem and report it to me. And be careful!"

"Of course, boss." The metal of the ladder felt warm under Rom's hands as he descended into the narrow shaft. He never liked working in the maintenance tunnels, since they were tight and the air down there smelled stale, but he liked the idea of an explosion beneath the smithy even less.

"I'm at the bottom now!" he shouted as soon as his feet touched solid ground on a four-way intersection. "The noise seems to be coming from tunnel three," he added after a quick look at the painted signs.

"Understood. Don't take any risks," came the answer from above.

Rom walked towards the source of the sizzling and dripping noises, ducking his head to avoid bumping against the tunnel's low ceiling.

Thin clouds of steam wafted through the upper part of the corridor, slowly drifting his way. His imagination saw twisted, ghostly shapes wherever they glowed under the dim lights of the magical lanterns. Reassuringly, they condensed into mere water that dripped down on him wherever they brushed past cooler stone.

Rom wiped the liquid off his brow. With his protection spell, the hot drizzle was more refreshing than annoying, and it cleared his thoughts. The old geezer above would already have been forced to stop at this point.

Rock vibrated under his feet as he got closer to the pumps, and the steaming puddles rippled constantly. Where was all the water even coming from? To his senses, the surrounding stone felt solid and unbroken. Nevertheless, the source of the hissing noise was in front of him. Great gouts of steam and liquid were shooting from a small crack in the wall.

He sucked in a sharp breath as he realised it wasn't a gash at all. The water was appearing out of thin air, boiling into existence around one of the wards against evil on the local mana conduit. The complicated symbol had to be extremely hot if the liquid was turning into steam upon contact.

He stared at the masterfully shaped medallion, tracing its clean and precise lines with his gaze. It was the ugliest thing he had ever seen in his life. With a snarl, he raised the pincer-shaped claw at the end of his right arm, eager to smash the offending ward to bits.

Above the rune-inscribed terraces of the casting chamber, the air crackled and popped as it oscillated between various shades of blue and violet. Robed wizards stood in small groups between meandering inscriptions and freestanding pillars, frowning up at the protective dome and wrinkling their foreheads. Near the outer walls, dwarven soldiers shuffled their feet as they watched the magicians, occasionally glancing at their officers as if wishing for orders.

On one of the cut-off pillars towering above the magical diagrams, Mengolin's expression grew darker with every breath. "It's still weakening! Hurry up with that node!" Raising a hand that glittered with jewel-encrusted rings, he pointed at a circle of wizards holding hands.

They were activating one of the chamber's still functional power nodes, coaxing mana from the intricate crystal patterns with their chanting. Light poured from the designs on the ground, growing in intensity until the spellcasting dwarfs were only visible as dark silhouettes surrounding the glow.

"You reported that the Dark Empress was gone!" the accusing voice of Countess Zasod came from the crystal ball on the marble pedestal in front of him.

"Well excuse me for assuming that his Grace's plan worked when she disappeared from all magical forms of tracking!" the court wizard snapped in irritation. He currently had little time to spare for the last remaining noble above the rank of baron, who was technically in command of the city.

"Stop! You are making things worse!" a female voice shouted from somewhere close, interrupting the Countess' reply.

Zasod's brow furrowed in disapproval as she spotted Ambassador Camilla in her so-called uniform that was too revealing to be decent. The blonde fairy was hovering in the air a few metres past the railing, her beating wings humming loudly.

"Explain, quickly!" Mengolin ordered. If Camilla had flown up here to interrupt them, she likely hadn't done so on idle speculation alone.

"Melissa down there-" she tilted her head towards her sisters, whose tall, slender silhouettes were unmistakable among the sturdier dwarfs, "says that the dome is fading faster every time you activate another of those mana nodes!"

The countess and the court wizard exchanged a look of horrified comprehension.

"Contaminated mana supply!" Mengolin blurted out.

"The attack is in the mana!" Zasod said at the same time.

The court wizard raised both hands over his head, his flowing robe fluttering from the rapid motion. He waved his fingers, and an attention-grabbing red flash lit up every corner of the chamber.

Heads turned in his direction, some of them squinting from the glare.

"Close the nodes! Do it now!" Mengolin shouted, amplifying his voice to thunderous levels.

Camilla winced and covered her ringing ears. She lost a metre of altitude before she recovered from the noise, and even then, a faint vibration in her bones remained. The resonance didn't fade. It grew unpleasantly in strength, making her bile rise, and she realised that it was already too late.

The centre of the dome broke with a sound like shattering glass. The jagged hole rapidly increased in size, its edges fragmenting into fading splinters as it sped outwards in an expanding circle.

At the same moment, the eight columns of green light stabbing towards the ceiling lost their colour. Clear pillars of icy water loomed in their place, standing still for a single moment before succumbing to gravity.

The wizards around the nodes shrieked and shielded their faces as the freezing water crashed down on them. Within moments, the pressure hammered all of them to the ground, and the roaring flow swept them along as it cascaded onto the lower platforms.

Mengolin gaped as a partially submerged sleeve turned a sickly yellow and its buttons expanded into a field of metallic scales. He could no longer tell where the garment ended and its wearer's skin began.

More of the drenched wizards changed, partially concealed by clouds of flying droplets and mist. Limbs bent at unnatural angles and silhouettes stretched and distorted into shapes that were only approximately dwarf-like.

"Monsters! They are turning into monsters!" one of the soldiers gasped.

By now, everyone had started shouting, pointing, and fleeing from the onrushing water. The few unassigned wizards were running about, trying to reach higher ground or casting protective spells.

The fairies were flying above the flood and shooting pink blasts from their palms. Where they struck, the ground buckled and turned into tooth-shaped spikes.

From his elevated position, Mengolin could see that they were trying to raise a semi-circular dam around the resting wounded.

A slimy arm shot towards the flying girls like a frog's tongue, growing thinner as it elongated. With a wet slap, three boneless fingers wrapped all the way around a slender calf.

The surprised fairy managed half of a startled shriek before the arm contracted and yanked her down, driving the breath from her lungs. Water fountained high into the air as she splashed down in front of the monster.

"Mengolin! Mengolin, answer me!" Countess Zasod demanded. She was hard to understand with all the frightened shouting, splashing, and clanging that echoed through the room.

He grabbed the crystal ball and ducked behind the pedestal, unwilling to wrest all of his attention away from the chaos below. Here was an opportunity to do something useful. "Yes, my Lady?"

"Report! The wards are going crazy all over the place, and I need to know what's going on!"

That, at least, was a question he could easily answer. "The casting chamber is no longer consuming most of the contaminated mana, so now it can reach the entire city. Also, it turns people into monsters."

Something big and hairy hopped past his platform and dropped back out of sight. There was a thumping noise, and a wizard's chanting turned into frightened screams.

"What?" the countess shouted. "Did Keeper Mercury open a breach into the Hell Below?"

"Sadly, I can't entirely exclude the possibility," he answered after a moment of thought. It would explain where all the evil energy was coming from. "She couldn't have dug into it, but she might have opened a portal. However, our wards should have stopped the corrupted magic from spreading much farther."

"The same wards she crushed on her way down?"

That was a point he hadn't considered. The realization felt like ice water running down his back, and for a moment, he feared he had been splashed. "My Lady, you must get yourself to safety while it's still possible! Try to reach a temple, or better yet, leave the city!"

"What if the priests protected an expedition to shut down the portal instead?" she asked, moving while she talked. There was a strange patch of ice growing on a flower pot, which she gave a wide berth.

A pair of clawed green hands reached for the edge of Mengolin's platform.

"I would advise-" the court wizard paused to shoot a bolt of lighting at the grasping limbs. When the climber let go, he continued "-smashing her dungeon heart instead. If there really is a portal, she needs to power it somehow."

"I'll consider your suggestion," the Countess said. "May the Light keep you safe!"

The crystal ball went dark.

That was a tall order, Mengolin concluded as he took stock of his situation.

Monsters were everywhere, stirring up the ankle-deep water as they moved towards the two dozen or so dwarfs who had climbed onto the higher platforms. Claws and multi-coloured blasts of magic rattled their shield wall, and it was only the air support from the three yelling, crying fairies that kept the swarming attackers at bay.

Well, if he wanted to make it out of here, he had his work cut out for him.

Ominous shadows crept over the bookshelves and the ornate desk in Torian's office as his floating candles moved in predetermined patterns. Droplets of red wax rained down like blood, turning into fading mist before they could stain the crimson carpet. In the flickering candlelight, it almost looked as if the gargoyle statues climbing the towering backrest of his chair were moving.

Torian himself sat behind the massive desk, the lower half of his face eclipsed by the glowing crystal ball in front of him. As the impressive centrepiece of the room, he exuded an aura of power, wisdom, and danger appropriate to his position. At least he liked to think so, because he had spent more time getting his office just right than he was willing to admit.

To his mild annoyance, the Corruption had gotten to his gargoyles, and now they were too cute and curvy to be properly intimidating. To his much greater annoyance, the carefully crafted arrangement was completely wasted on visitors who insisted on rudely standing behind him and looking over his shoulders.

Cathy leaned in closer, resting her weight on the left armrest of his chair and denting the wood with her armoured gauntlet. "How does staring at that," she scowled at the scene in the crystal ball, "help us figure out what's going on?"

At first glance, it appeared as if the orb was displaying the sun. A small hill of ice glowed so brightly that the box-like building it had buried remained a dark and indistinct silhouette. An aquamarine tornado of energy swirled around its slopes, reaching up to the cave's ceiling and whipping debris across its walls. Jagged, crack-like inclusions of pure darkness spread outwards from the ice, pulsing and growing larger as they melded with the maelstrom.

He wished she would just let him think in peace if she had nothing of value to contribute. "You have, of course, a better suggestion than watching the place we saw her last?" he asked, not bothering to hide his annoyance.

"Send someone over there to find her!" the swordswoman demanded.

"Completely pointless," he answered immediately. "Even if we could safely teleport someone over there, they wouldn't be able to do any better than directly scrying on her or using her dungeon as a link to locate her." Both of those methods had failed, which raised some disturbing questions. They were almost infallible short of divine intervention, as far as he knew.

"We are pretty sure she's inside that building," Cathy said, tapping the crystal ball where it showed the ice-covered boxy shape. "We could try talking to her through the walls!"

"Provided we could somehow survive the raging torrent of magical energy around it," he pointed out the huge, glaring flaw in her otherwise valid idea. "Besides, I'm becoming more and more convinced that everything is going exactly according to her plan."

"Excuse me, but you will have to explain that one to me," Snyder's voice said from somewhere to the right of his desk. The redheaded acolyte was kneeling on the ground, pulling up the eyelid of a prone imp and waving a shining finger left and right in front of her huge black eyeball.

The imp's chest was rising and falling slowly, but her eye didn't show as much as a single twitch in reaction to the light.

"I fail to see how a complete loss of communications, comatose imps and inert traps – all without a single hint of warning and while we are besieged by a hostile army – could be part of some grand master plan," Snyder elaborated.

"Indeed," Jadeite agreed. He stood to Torian's left; arms crossed over his open jacket, and was looking at the warlock with a hint of curiosity.

If there was anything satisfying about this situation, it was the fact the rest of the inner circle had been kept in the dark too. "Operational security," he stated. "The Empress wanted to avoid even the possibility of there being a leak. Perhaps her plan leaves her vulnerable, which is why she is concealing her location."

Cathy and Jadeite exchanged a silent look, and the former shook her head.

"What plan?" the swordswoman asked. "What do you think she's doing?"

Even if Mercury was keeping those two around for their power, rather than their brains, they should have been able to figure that out on their own. "Let's see. There's a huge whirlpool of evil magic below the city. Corrupted water appears everywhere and turns its denizens into monsters who bear a certain resemblance to the likes of Lishika, Mareki, or Umbra. Why, it almost looks as if chasing down the Duke was a convenient misdirection that let her reach a location from where she could easily corrupt the whole city!"

Cathy returned Torian's smug smile with an expression as if she had just sucked on a lemon and then covered her eyes with her hand. "That's what everybody is going to assume, isn't it?" she asked.

"Well, it is rather obvious in hindsight," Torian replied.

"Nevertheless, she can't be doing this on purpose," Jadeite contradicted, his eyes reflecting the pale, bluish glare in the crystal ball. "It's just too much power for her to control. Even my body couldn't withstand channelling that much dark power for so long."

Torian glanced up at the curly-haired man, raising an eyebrow. "Excuse me? Are you seriously suggesting that something is beyond her Majesty's capabilities just because you can't do it?"

"Yes. There's no vast difference between her power and my own as long as she isn't drawing on her treasury," the dark general stated confidently.

Preposterous. Torian didn't scoff at the boast, but only because he didn't dare anger Jadeite. To think that he considered himself a near equal of the Dark Empress! Then again, he had pulled off magical effects on a fairly absurd scale…

"You think this is some kind of convenient accident?" the chief warlock drawled, waving his palm at the crystal ball.

"It's not convenient at all!" Cathy snapped. "We don't even know for sure if she's all right!"

A roughly human-shaped rock mushroomed upwards from the carpet, right in front of Torian's desk. It cracked and crumbled, revealing the muscular form of Mercury's sister underneath the stone shell.

"No change with the dungeon heart," Tiger reported. "It's still stuck mid-beat, growing neither brighter nor dimmer. No luck searching for," her eyes briefly flicked towards Torian, "secret identity, either."

"Well, there you have it," the chief warlock said. "Dungeon heart still active, imps still alive, and we aren't being attacked by angry ghosts either. She's fine."

"Doesn't mean she's not in trouble," Cathy muttered. "And don't remind me of the ghosts. By the way," she leaned forward over Torian's desk, steadying herself on its delicate surface with her gauntleted hands, and shouted towards the door "have you guys found out where the wraith-thing with the chains disappeared to yet?"

Her call echoed in the hallway outside for a moment before hasty footsteps approached.

A thin warlock with a gaunt face skidded to a halt in front of the doorway and grabbed onto its wood as his feet slipped on the smooth tiles. His shoes and legs, as well as half of his short tunic were splattered with thick, transparent slime.

Torian recognised the disgusting gunk. The huge eyeballs that Empress Mercury had repurposed for ward-breaking duty weren't dealing well with their increased power supply. Some were popping at random, which made the scrying chamber a place to avoid if you could. One of the reasons why everybody important had gathered in his office.

"It's hiding in a dark place, Commander," the warlock reported, saluting. The motion transferred some of the slime from his hand to his forehead, and he grimaced.

"Hey, you got here surprisingly fast," Tiger praised him. She was sitting on the edge of Torian's desk, something he grudgingly tolerated because he liked not being on fire.

"Thank you, Princess, but I was already on my way," the warlock said, bowing. "Bad news, I'm afraid. The besieging force is preparing for an attack."

"Damn it!" Cathy exclaimed, reaching for her helmet. "They know our defences are weakened. How many of them are moving?" she asked while striding towards the door.

"All of them, Commander. Roughly three thousand dwarfs," he reported.

"That's twice as many as last time," Snyder whispered, his face pale. "They are holding nothing back, and with the dungeon heart gone into cardiac arrest…"

"We will have no choice but to deal with them more forcefully," Jadeite said in a cold tone of voice.

"What a pity," Torian said, his sarcasm concealing his worry. Fending off that many of the burrowing, hairy nuisances without Keeper support or traps would be difficult, at the very least.

"Mercury isn't going to like that," Cathy disagreed, the corners of her lips moving downward.

"Do you have a better idea?" Jadeite challenged.

"I have one that might just work!" Tiger said as she slid off the desk and started bouncing on her tiptoes. "Cathy, fetch me your most useless goblin! No, better make it three instead! I'll be right back!"

The orange and black youma disappeared under a shell of dull stone, which crumbled to dust as she teleported away.

Last edited: Sep 2, 2017

Trapped (second half)

The city gates of Salthalls stood wide open, and streams of dwarfs spilled out into the surrounding countryside while alarm bells rang ceaselessly. None of the sweat-drenched, red-faced and panting citizens had energy to spare to look at the sky, and so they didn't spot the figure floating high above them.

Tiger would have expected fleeing to involve more running, but the crowds below her were made up of people who were simply too exhausted to move quickly. Instead, they were walking at a brisk pace, keeping an eye on their surroundings and avoiding anything that looked wet. It was a good thing she had no intention to use the clogged-up streets. Now where was that well Mercury had used to enter the city?

She quickly located the circular shaft and teleported inside, staying hidden from the dwarfs. The calm water below her reflected her orange-skinned form as she took a small crystal ball from her backpack. Right, the chambers her adopted sister had broken into were that way.

She wasn't going to teleport as she couldn't be certain the dwarfs hadn't replaced the wards Mercury had broken on her way in. She wasn't going to dig either. Her earth-flavoured magic allowed her to part soil and rock alike. It was like pulling aside a curtain and closing it behind her, creating a small bubble that moved through the underground unimpeded.

Water spurted into her moving bubble of space, splashing her in the face.

She spluttered in surprise and held her breath on reflex. Oh, yes, there had been an aquifer in the way. Hurrying up, she managed to pass through before the liquid reached higher than her hips. What a great start.

Finally, worked stone replaced the rock below her, and a ceiling peeled open under her. The water she brought along immediately dropped to the ground with a loud splash.

So much for a stealthy entrance. Hopefully, with all the running noises and shouts coming from all around, nobody had heard her. She quickly checked her surroundings.

Flickering lights, a little dim from the hoar frost that covered them, illuminated a stone chamber with stacks of wooden crates. One open door led to an empty corridor where a strangely static cloud of mist hovered above a sculpted sink. The other door opened to a large hallway, where a large humanoid frog was staring at her from behind one of the decorative pillars.

She jumped in surprise and raised her hands, ready to summon a spell.

The creature's huge yellow eyes blinked once. It watched her for a few seconds and then walked away, its feet making slapping noises as it shambled deeper down the tunnel.

All right. No need to defend herself. She was just going to start her search, then. Down the other passage.

She had been sneaking around for several minutes when Cathy's voice intruded in her head. "Tiger, are you in Salthalls? What are you doing?"

"Looking for a big pool of evil water," she summarised her plan.

"What? You'll mutate if you touch it!" Cathy's mental voice shouted.

"Nah, this definitely feels like home. Metallia-flavoured dark power," she reassured her as she peeked around a statue. "Besides, I'll be careful."

"You just stepped into a puddle," Cathy replied, sounding half horrified and half exasperated.

She looked down. Water rippled around her feet. Another drop dripped from the icicle on the ceiling as she inspected her foot. "So I did. See? It's not doing anything to me. In fact..."

She squatted down and dipped her finger into the cool liquid.

"What are you doing? Stop! Don't!"

Ignoring the swordswoman, she licked her finger clean. "Yep. As I thought, it's just food to me."

"Are you crazy? Don't take unnecessary risks like that!" Cathy paused. "You aren't planning to use that stuff on my goblins, are you?"

Tiger tiptoed onwards, passing a few stairs down. There was a hostile pressure in the air. Had she ended up somewhere where the wards were still working? "Stop distracting me, I may be in a bit of trouble-"

"Stop!" A low, commanding voice said behind her.

"Gah!" Startled, she whirled around.

A short figure wearing so many layers of rain clothing that it was almost impossible to tell what it looked like underneath was threatening her with a mace. It also had a spear strapped to its back.

"You one of the sane ones?" the probably-dwarf asked in a gruff voice, keeping his weapon ready to strike.

"Yes? I mean, I'm not going to attack you if you don't attack me first," Tiger answered tentatively, wondering how he had managed to get behind her in the first place.

"Fair enough. Think you can distract the bunch of crazies camped outside while I sneak a group of people past?"

"Huh?" she replied eloquently. She finally spotted the secret door in the wall behind the dwarf. It looked just like the masonry and stood open a few centimetres. Several pairs of eyes were watching her through the narrow gap.

While she wasn't looking, the dwarf had somehow gotten his hands on her shoulder and was now pushing her in the direction of a doorway. "Don't worry, they don't go after their own!"

"Watch out, there's a whole bunch of monsters on the plaza beyond that door!" Cathy pointed out, not very helpfully in Tiger's opinion.

She sighed. Easier to go along with the flow than to cause a loud disturbance. "Fine, but at least give me directions to the nearest wine cellar."

The dwarf chuckled. "Hah, you are still sane all right. Fine, just keep the monsters' attention for a while!"

She stumbled through a wide, arched doorway, and many inhuman heads turned to face her.

Behind a stall that sold jewellery, a bearded creature with huge bat-like ears screeched, drawing the attention of the monsters that hadn't spotted her yet. More mutants appeared from various shops, and an entire group of creatures sitting on the stairs around a semi-frozen fountain turned in unison, like a school of fish.

She surveyed the marketplace and its occupants. It wouldn't have looked out of place in the Dark Kingdom, actually. This, she knew how to handle. She stood tall and proud, clenching her fists as she flared the dark power coursing through her.

The closest creatures took a step back, while those farther away ducked their heads and looked down. Some at the very back of the room discretely shuffled towards the exit.

With a grin, she swept her gaze over the beings who tried to make themselves appear smaller. "Good, you guys can sense who's in charge! I need some stuff carried, and guess who's going to do the hard work?"

Lines of dwarven soldiers advanced quickly through the streaming rain, crossing the surface terrain far faster than they could have dug their way into the dungeon. With the enemy Keeper unable to strike at them with her magic, they could simply walk over the outer defensive tunnels and preserve their strength.

Or at least they thought so until an absolutely enormous lightning bolt dropped from the sky and struck the mountain's flank.

The advance faltered as the armoured figures blinked, momentarily blinded by the flash, and squinted at the spot where it had struck.

A transparent, bubble-shaped dome covered the surprisingly undamaged impact point, protecting the two figures and the wine barrel within.

Tiger looked down the slope at the rows of unsettled dwarfs and couldn't help but admire Jadeite's skill with illusions. That lightning bolt had certainly captured everyone's attention and focused it on her.

A sparkling bolt of pinkish light rose from the back of the enemy formation, tumbled through the air, and hit the shield with no more effect than the raindrops.

She hoped his protection spells were just as good as his illusions and didn't visibly react.

In contrast, the absolutely rotund goblin at her side whimpered in fright and dropped to his knees. The green monster was so fat that he was almost round. Due to his weight, she couldn't teleport him, the barrel, and another goblin, as she had originally planned. Still, roughly dwarf-shaped as he was, he would suffice for her demonstration.

"Greetings, dwarfs!" she shouted, spreading her arms and throwing her cloak wide open. Better to get this done and over with before someone decided to rush her position.

Below, helmeted heads jerked and looked around in surprise. The vampires in the scavenging room were successfully transmitting her words directly to the enemies' brains, then.

"I can't help wonder if you really thought this attack through," she continued. "By now, you must have learned of what's happening at Salthalls!"

An angry roar from many throats answered her.

"Excellent. Now, you should be asking yourselves whether or not the Dark Empress can do at her seat of power what she can do in a distant dwarven city."

Pausing for dramatic effect, she raised a ladle and held it up for several seconds.

"The answer is 'yes', obviously!" She dipped the ladle into the open barrel that had once held wine, but now held water from one of Salthalls' deeper channels. With an over-exaggerated swing, she splashed the fat goblin with the ladle's contents.

Horrified gasps came from her audience as the green creature started growing until it was taller than Tiger. The large, triangular ears had turned into real horns, and an armoured shell covered the formerly flabby skin.

Satisfied with the effect, the black-striped youma continued. "Oh, but, I can already tell what you are thinking. It's a bluff. A trick. An illusion. She merely cast a spell on that goblin. She doesn't have enough water to get all of you. To all of that, I have a simple answer: Observe!"

Her index finger pointed upwards, towards the mountain's peak. Up in the sky, beyond even the crenelations of the looming black tower, flew three of Mercury's airships.

Wind howled through the circular hole in the bottom of the airships' gondola, tearing at the robes of the chanting warlocks. The three mages stood in a triangular formation around the gaping opening, leaning on staves affixed just as tightly to the floor as their boots.

Flames and arcane symbols moved in counter-rotating circles around the hole as their chanting intensified, reaching the final stages of the summoning ritual.

As always when the spell was used on a submerged target, it didn't just summon the intended person. Lishika appeared in the centre of the open hole, just above where the floor would have been. Around her was a cylinder of water that almost reached the cabin's ceiling.

It kept its shape for an instant even as it started dropping through the hole in the floor.

The slender, long-tailed youma immersed in the column of water immediately reacted when she felt herself starting to fall. She disappeared with a flash of lightning, and the many cubic metres of contaminated water continued descending without her.

Umbra and Mareki made their own escapes from their respective pillars of water, which plummeted from the other two airships.

The many tons of liquid only partially dispersed as they dropped several hundred meters. Their impact still shook the ground and caused minor avalanches. A copse of young trees near an impact point was completely uprooted, and denser vegetation had its leaves ripped away. None of the water had been aimed directly at the dwarfs, but the spray drifting in the air and the water running down the mountain still threatened to get them if they continued on their current course.

A wolf-sized blur darted out of the dripping underbrush and raced up a tree. Blue fur glistened wetly on spider-like legs as the creature ascended the trunk in defiance of gravity and disappeared among the branches. The bark moved where it had been touched, shivering and shuddering like jelly.

Count Ornish shuddered too and put down his telescope. That little monster might have been a rabbit before the water had gotten to it, if the long ears were any indication. Stone-faced, he turned to the other dwarfs in the room. "It's not a bluff."

"I could feel the impact even here," his court wizard said, his skin the colour of chalk. "So much water. My Lord, it's going to seep underground. The sappers-"

Ornish raised both hands. "I know. I know!" There was a metallic grinding noise, and it took him a moment to realise that it was coming from his clenching armoured fist. "We cannot win this," he concluded.

"But, my Lord!" Baron Sodnil protested. "Can't we work around this? What if the priests make us protective talismans? Countess Zasod reports that the victims can regain their minds, if not their true shapes! Salthalls needs our help!"

The count looked at him with regret. His old friend hadn't been the same since his daughter had been captured by the Keeper. "Sodnil, the effects on our own troops are a secondary concern. There are eight thousand captive civilians in her dungeon. If we press on, we will be outnumbered nearly three to one."

The dwarven commanders looked at each other with grim expressions. They all knew what a numbers disadvantage meant when attacking an entrenched enemy.

"Signal the retreat," Count Ornish ordered, his mouth tasting like ashes. "Inform Countess Zasod that she is on her own."

Ami's light spells had faded away over an hour ago, and the inside of the adamantine prison was dark. She was sitting on its floor, her pale face illuminated only by the shine of her computer's display as she stared at the lines scrolling past.

Finally, the dance of her fingers over the keyboard stopped, and she leaned back and rolled her shoulders. Her neck felt stiff from sitting still for so long, and she let out a long sigh.

"Are you finding the wards not to your liking?" Duke Libasheshtan taunted her from the corner she had pushed him into so she had more space to work.

As she swivelled her torso to face him, some of her screen's brightness washed over the uncovered adamantine. The arcane patterns engraved into the bluish metal glittered like a sky full of stars as the light hit them.

"They seem flawless, as far as I can tell," she admitted in a resigned voice, secretly impressed by their design. They did some clever things to spatial dimensions to hide everything beyond the room from magical means of travel. Her Mercury computer could even provide mathematical proof that leaving required passing through the volume of space currently occupied by the adamantine walls.

"I told you the Light gods are unsurpassed when it comes to defences," the Duke said smugly.

His attempts to needle her made her feel a little less guilty about keeping him stuck in the ice block. She cringed when she tried to imagine what standing still for so long felt like.

"Are you ready to give up yet? Might as well kill yourself now if you are really worried about your magic making a mess outside," he said. The melt water collecting underneath him indicated that he wouldn't stay immobilized for much longer.

She rose to her feet, feeling a prickling sensation as blood rushed back into her legs. "I'll have a go at the adamantine first," she informed him.

"Hah! This will be entertaining. For me," he said. "I'm looking forward to finding out what happens to a Keeper who tries to use holy magic."

Turning away from him, she refused to let his words intimidate her. On the ground, she could dimly make out the pattern she had scratched with the aid of the mace she had picked up. Careful not to disturb the lines, she stepped into one of the loops of the mana-gathering diagram and faced the wall.

Mana that had collected over time within the bounds of the concentric circles flooded into her body. It felt like a pittance compared to what she was used to working with, but it should suffice for two spells.

She broke into a cold sweat as she mentally reviewed the necessary formulas and motions. Shaping a spell from scratch, without the assistance of a dungeon heart, required precise motions and flawless concentration. She had exhaustive theoretical knowledge of what she needed to do, but lacked experience and enough mana to try again if she made a mistake.

Goblins and imps could manage spellcasting, she reminded herself. It couldn't be too difficult. Besides, she had carefully selected the simplest spells that would still work for her purposes. After a long, calming breath, she opened her eyes and drew the mana to her hands with determination.

The act of forming a spell required enough of her concentration that she had no more time for self-doubt. Her fingertips traced glowing arcs in the air as she hurried to stabilise the structures defined by the words she was chanting. Without her dungeon heart taking care of details like that, everything felt far more difficult and unstable.

Nevertheless, she managed to finish the spell and pointed with her arms straight at the adamantine wall. She aimed at the central rune of the prison's warding scheme, almost touching it with her index and middle finger, and released the magic.

A lance of brilliant white shot from the extended digits, and with a flash, searing heat radiated from the impact point.

Yelping, she jerked her hand back and shook it to cool her burnt fingertips. She should have kept more distance instead of worrying about missing her target!

Duke Libasheshtan was guffawing. "A classic case of much pain, no gain!"

Blinking, she waited for her vision to recover from the brief flare. "I wouldn't say that," she disagreed.

A red spot no larger than a fingernail glowed on the wall like a baleful eye.

"You have hurt yourself completing the first step of a process you can't finish. Congratulations. How's that holy magic coming along, by the way?"

"I have an idea that might work," she answered in a quiet voice. She had no way to get true holy power with which to revitalise the adamantine, but she hoped she could substitute life energy.

Its properties were close to holy power to begin with, and it had additional traits that made her optimistic. Injured dark gods could use it to heal, and it enabled her to use her magic when her body was drifting in the dark realm in a state of pseudo-death. There was a good chance it could do the same for a piece of not-quite-dead remnant of a divine being.

As for getting some life energy, well, she could drain some from the Duke. She glanced over at him and then dismissed the idea. The adamantine would certainly reject energy stolen from an unwilling victim. She would have to use her own.

She placed her uninjured hand on her collarbone and used her remaining mana to cast a life-draining spell. Her legs grew weak as she carefully drew a thread of softly glowing white light out of herself, and a wave of tiredness washed through her.

She stumbled and leaned against the wall to remain standing, feeling as if she had just worked herself to exhaustion.

"Wait. What did you just do?" Duke Libasheshtan asked, craning his neck sideways as far as he could in order to see the small light hovering over her palm better.

She felt too woozy to answer him, so she focused on catching her breath and not falling over as she directed a tendril of energy at the red-hot spot.

The heated metal sucked in the offered life energy greedily, devouring her small ball of light within seconds.

"You can't generate holy power, that's just impossible! Unless-" The Duke's wide-eyed expression briefly turned thoughtful before settling on exasperated disbelief. "Why would you carry a container full of holy power on your person? What could a Keeper possible need it for?" His gaze briefly focused on her outfit. "And where did you even-"

His voice had grown a little higher-pitched, and she got the impression he would have thrown up his arms in frustration if the ice had let him.

"No. Don't answer any of that. Please. I still value my sanity." He was shaking his head, black beard whipping left and right. "I'll just be over here and take comfort in the fact that you can't cheat at the last part, no matter how well prepared."

Too tired to shoot him even a half-hearted glare, she proceeded with the next step of the procedure. Blood and judgement. She didn't want to touch the spot of searing hot metal, but if she let a drop of blood run down the wall then it should get there easily enough.

Clenching her teeth and bracing herself for pain, she placed her burnt fingertips onto one of the sharper-angled engraved wards. With a quick sideways jerk, she ripped open the singed skin.

It didn't hurt as much as she had expected. A droplet of blood seeped from her index finger and left a dark trail as it trickled down the wall.

She followed it with her eyes, taking note of the faint bluish shimmer it left in its wake. Was the adamantine already active and judging her? She should pass, if the Duke's information was correct. Her intentions were good, and she had always tried to do the right thing.

But would the adamantine see it the same way? She had become a Keeper to save her own life – admittedly without understanding the ramifications at the time. Likewise, she had started worshipping Metallia out of fear of what could happen if she didn't.

Would the adamantine be able to tell that she had done so on the advice of the Light, or would it only see that she had benefited from her association with a dark god? Worse, Metallia had rewarded her for services rendered.

She didn't know if the divine material considered circumstances. Could it even look at the past? If it could only evaluate her current state... Hope blossomed for a moment before she concluded that yes, it could at least look at everything she had done. It wouldn't be able to figure out her intentions without accessing her mind, and that meant it could read her memories too.

It would see every occasion when she had suppressed her conscience out of pragmatism.

Cold sweat appeared on her brow as she worried about what it would think of her more questionable compromises. Such as carefully staying ignorant of her employees' past crimes and atrocities because she needed the manpower. Still using imps as expendable slave labour and golem parts when she could no longer be entirely sure that this version stayed non-sapient. Injuring, scaring and imprisoning people who were in her way.

Her throat went dry, and she gulped. There were also many other, lesser reasons for feeling guilty. Hiding the truth about being Sailor Mercury from her mother, for example. Not dedicating time to protecting her civilians from the effects of her dungeon's Corruption. Accidentally ruining Cathy's, Jered's, Snyder's and Camilla's careers.

None of those, however, even compared to her greatest regret. Good people had died unnecessarily while attacking her dungeon. She could have prevented the deaths of those poor dwarfs. Fighting had not been her only option. She could have surrendered and taken the Light's standing offer of sanctuary and imprisonment.

She dropped to her knees, hanging her head. In despair, she clenched her fists so hard that more blood spilled from her fingertips.

Still, she clung to her belief that she had made the right choice. She simply couldn't sacrifice her own freedom while her world was still threatened by Metallia. Her friends needed her. Everything she had learned about the Dark Kingdom suggested that the senshi were completely outmatched, and she needed to find a way back so she could support them.

Glancing at the adamantine, she fervently hoped that it agreed with her reasoning. Otherwise, Earth would fall to Metallia, and this world would follow soon after.

The faint flicker of blue along the blood trail faded out.

"Well, that was quick." the Duke drawled. "You failed, to nobody's surprise," he stated with certainty.

"W-what?" She whipped her head around to stare at him, tears gathering in the corners of her wide-open eyes.

"It's obvious. If you can shrug off being confronted with your evil deeds so easily, then it's clear you aren't capable of feeling guilt and regret like a truly good person."

"W-wait, you mean this happens to everyone?" she asked, blinking rapidly. A little bit of warning about the adamantine making her relive the parts of her life she was least proud of would have been appreciated.

"No. The lack of lamentations, tears, and self-loathing is unusual. Even the most virtuous dwarfs take some time to recover from the experience." He snorted. "Someone with a working conscience who had committed even a fraction of a Keeper's crimes would remain incoherent for weeks."

"I see," she stated softly as her racing heart slowed down somewhat. The guilt had felt horrible – still did – but it wasn't crippling. She also didn't think she had already become a cold-hearted monster. She simply could justify most of her actions to herself, which might have been enough to shield her.

"So," she began after a moment, "is there some visual clue when someone passes the judgement, or did you simply draw conclusions from observing me?"

"The latter," the Duke replied. "Not that the outcome was ever in doubt."

He didn't know for sure! She looked at the ground. With the help of the reddish glow from the heated metal, she quickly located the mace she had placed on the floor near the heated spot.

Metal screeched as she reached for the handle and pulled the weapon closer, dragging its spiky head over the floor.

The Duke winced at the noise and tracked her movements with his eyes. "Now what are you planning to do with that?"

"I'll experimentally verify your conclusion," she explained as she propped the mace's head onto the ground and used its long handle to pull herself to her feet. Leaning against the wall, she managed to lift the weapon despite her protesting muscles. She felt so weak with some of her life energy missing.

He relaxed. "You'll merely be making a fool out of yourself."

"We shall see," she said as she swung the mace.

With a loud clang, it slammed into the adamantine wall and bounced off, almost tearing itself from her grip.

"Not a single scratch!" the Duke laughed. "Told you so!"

She grimaced at the impact point. "I missed!" she protested. "The heated spot is tiny!"

"You are delusional," the dwarf scoffed. "Delusional but entertaining."

She ignored his unhelpful commentary and brought the weapon closer to the red-hot area. If she couldn't aim properly with her current lack of strength, then she would use her body weight to push one of the mace's spikes through the softened metal.

Groaning with the effort, she raised the weapon until she held it horizontally and rested it against the red-hot spot. The strain on her arms lowered when she leaned on the handle, pressing the weapon's head harder against the red-hot spot.

With most of her weight resting on the mace, it suddenly slid to the side and slipped from her fingers.

Off balance, she toppled straight towards the spot of heated metal. She yelped and threw herself to the side, instinctively averting her face from the radiating heat.

Her shoulder bumped against the wall, and the smell of burnt hair wafted through the room as she slid to the ground.

Behind her, the Duke was laughing so hard that the ice trapping him vibrated from the noise.

Was he right and the adamantine was still invulnerable? Breathing hard, she squinted at its red glow. Her breath hitched.

"Look! LOOK!" she shouted with so much excitement in her voice that the Duke stopped laughing and shot her a puzzled look.

His gaze followed her extended arm and index finger towards the heated adamantine. It took him a moment to notice that she was pointing at a thread of molten metal. Like syrup sticking to the mace, it had stretched out into a thin filament when the weapon fell.

He stared at the dangling string of adamantine, his eyebrows creeping upwards until they disappeared underneath the rim of his helmet and made his bulging eyes appear even wider. His jaw dropped, and a strange noise escaped his throat.

"It worked!" she cheered, her tiredness briefly washed away by a surge of relief. The divine material was allowing her to shape it, even if doing so was difficult.

"It can't be! I- Impossible! You are a Keeper!" the Duke protested. "It cannot- Even I couldn't- How? Why? Worthy? But she's a Keeper! A Keeper! I don't- Never wrong- but, but, but, Keeper!"

While his words devolved into even more incoherent babbling, Ami sat up and recovered her fallen mace, ready to attack the molten adamantine with renewed vigour. It was sticky, so she should be able to scrape bits away until there was a hole.

Using the weapon's long handle, she could reach the molten spot even while seated. In fact, she could preserve her strength by propping it up against her knees and rolling it up and down a little to achieve a drilling effect.

True to her prediction, the sticky adamantine clung to the points of her improvised tool, accumulating in larger and larger globs on the spikes as she scratched at the heated metal.

Her hands suddenly encountered resistance. The mace was stuck, impossible to budge.

Mana flooded into her empty reserves, feeling like ice cubes moving underneath her skin, and she gasped in surprise. Understanding struck her a split-second later. She had made a hole in the prison through which the magic could flood in.

Her eyes shone a bright crimson, making the ward-engraved patch of revealed adamantine in front of her look violet and confirming that she was a Keeper again.

Far away, her dungeon heart sluggishly awakened from slumber. Her awareness was limited to its immediate surroundings, as everything further than a few metres away remained hidden behind a curtain of darkness. Tile by tile, this darkness receded, as if she was rapidly claiming the territory.

The wave of expanding awareness reached the first intersection and rushed down each of the three outgoing tunnels simultaneously. Everything it passed provided information. The state of the walls, the clicking of traps rearming themselves, the amount of water within the pipes within the wall.

Another intersection, and yet another. The rush of knowledge sped up exponentially. The amount of gold and gems in her treasury. The number of withered plants in one of the farms. An imp, rubbing her eyes in confusion. More intersections.

Ami grabbed her head in discomfort as the flashes of knowledge came faster and faster, too quickly for her to process them. They produced a sensation like pins and needles, multiplied by the size of her dungeon.

Running goblins. Armoury. Swords, daggers, clubs. Half-finished reaperbot. Frost patterns. Wandering civilian. Right angles. Aquamarine tiles. Dripping water. Trolls. Beakers. Cables. Mixed patrol. Intruders. Gems. Dragon. Tall ceilings, right angles. Pools and water. Warlocks. Slender pillars. Chatting dark elves. Intersectio-

The flood of information became too great for her tired mind to handle. Already weakened from draining her own life energy, she slowly toppled forward from her seated position, unconscious.

Last edited: Sep 9, 2017

Contamination Concerns

A mess of tubes, pipes, and cables crisscrossed just underneath the ceiling, blocking the view of carved crystals, rune-covered gears, and colourful glass spheres. Suspended bowls of dry ice dispensed clouds of grey fog that slowly drifted towards the tall metal cylinders lining the catwalk below.

The double row of looming, barrel-shaped devices had an unexpected gap. A dozen imps with clear gems stuck in their foreheads were crawling over a half-disassembled furnace, working with blank expressions.

Three-fingered hands simultaneously traced a double line of arcane glyphs across a metal cover, finishing at the same time. Silently, the steel split apart as if the symbols were a seam, and the detached piece dropped towards the fog-covered floor.

Three more imps near the base of the furnace raised their hands and caught the fallen piece without interrupting their attempts to unscrew the hatch in front of them. Without apparent communication, they left the fallen part to the middle one, who stuffed it into his bag. He somersaulted and disappeared with a green swirl. A few seconds later, green motes gathered in the same spot, and the imp reappeared with an empty bag.

Above them on the catwalk, two more imps with clipboards were making sketches of the disassembling process in meticulous detail, never looking up from their sheets.

A loud, single heartbeat thundered in the distance.

From the direction of the treasury, a female voice exclaimed, "Uh-oh!"

In complete unison, the imps turned their heads towards the lights that were turning on behind an invisible, fast-moving border that was racing in their direction.

When it passed them, a loud siren started blaring, drowning out the distant thumping of the heart. Two coil-wrapped protrusions concealed between the pipes and tubes on the ceiling started humming, and the smell of ozone permeated the air.

The imps reacted immediately. Two of them grabbed a third and hurled him at the activating trap.

The ballistic imp reached for the coil-wrapped rods as he hurtled through the air, his unblinking black eyeballs reflecting the glow of the lightning building between the two protrusions. He was almost touching them when it discharged, firing a blinding bolt straight into his head.

The imp burst apart, his pieces dispersing into green mana vapour that smelled of fried meat and burning cloth. A finger-sized spike of clear crystal briefly continued on its trajectory before it clattered down somewhere among the furnaces.

The lightning trap's hum was building again when the second thrown imp reached it. With one hand, the small creature grabbed onto one of the hanging tubes that had concealed the trap. While swinging, he dragged the digits of his other hand across the base of the device.

A jagged gash tore open in the wake of the imp's fingers, and the trap went dead with a final crackling zap.

As one, the remaining imps turned towards the far part of the catwalk. They opened their mouths and started squeaking individual sounds that somehow synchronized up into words. "Midori. You assured me that she would not recover."

"Bartholomeus didn't when his heart was in this state!" the female voice from the nearby treasury shouted back. "I was under the impression that we had to grab everything we could before the dwarfs get here!"

"One example does not make a pattern. I wish to investigate. Attend me!" the imps replied in their eerie chorus as they swivelled back towards the partially disassembled furnace.

"Seriously?" came the annoyed reply. With a puff of pale sparks, a female figure clad entirely in tight black leather appeared in front of the imps. Red light spilled from the eyeholes of her mask, and the large bag slung over her shoulder clattered as she finished her pirouette. A few sapphires spilled from a scorched hole in the brown fabric. "You want to investigate now? As opposed to getting out with the loot while we still can?"

Green motes flashed into existence, and a girl made of ice teleported into the middle of the group. Without hesitation, she launched a punch at the closest large-eyed face.

The targeted imp bent backwards to let the attack pass overhead. Simultaneously, another imp kicked the ice golem in the back of her knee.

The animated statue shifted her weight on her other leg, only to trip over a third imp who had sneaked into her blind spot. While falling, she thrust her elbow at her assailant, only to have him yanked aside by the imp who had kicked her.

"Case in point," the possessed dark mistress said as the ice golem struck the ground.

The imp dangling from the tube above swung his legs and let go, plummeting towards the prone figure. With a loud crack, his pick stabbed through one of the golem's hip joints, spraying his allies with water.

Even prone and pinned in place, the statue wasn't helpless. She raised one hand towards Midori, curving her fingers into a claw-like shape.

Anticipating a ranged attack, the dark mistress turned into a blurry streak. When the golem's fingers detached with popping noises, she was already moving. The icicle-like projectiles pierced the illusory afterimages she left in her wake, and then she stomped on the statue's wrist with her hard-soled boot.

An instant later, a prone chicken lay where the prone ice golem had been.

Midori kicked at the bird but missed. Surprised, the Keeper glared at the imp who was stuffing the struggling chicken into his bag.

Without comment, the worker climbed back onto the partially deconstructed furnace, joining his comrades.

"Didn't you hear me? We have to leave!" Midori said, addressing the turned backs of the imps.

"Denied," replied their synchronised squeaks as they pried loose more pieces of metal. "I am not finished here. My curiosity is not yet satisfied."

"But you are hearing the alarms, right?" the dark mistress said, her crimson gaze pointed back over her shoulder. "More enemies are on the way."

"Unacceptable. I require more time," the imps objected as they cautiously unscrewed a smaller cylinder within the device.

The leather-clad woman sighed and raised her hands, showing the razor-sharp blades tipping her gloves. "Well, I can't exactly take on a dungeon with a single mistress."

"Understood." Four imps hopped back onto the catwalk, their feet touching the metal at the same instant. "New experiment. Evaluating the battle performance of perfect teamwork against a numerically superior foe."

Crimson eyes narrowing, Midori grabbed the two closest workers by their backpacks as they moved past. "Those are my best imps you want to risk there!"

"I shall assemble some adequate replacements for any that are lost." The short workers rolled their shoulders, easily slipping out of their restraints.

"Wait! What about the traps?"

The imps stopped as one, raising their gazes towards the ceiling. Among the distracting forest of pipes, lights, and metal boxes, any dangers would be almost impossible to spot before they claimed a victim.

"Let's just leave," Midori urged, patting the bag of loot. "Your greater self would be quite annoyed if you lost all your gathered information while you took a needless risk."

The imps remained quiet for a few seconds. "Agreed," they finally replied with audible dissatisfaction. Each of them jumped at the same time, disappearing with a green flash at the apex of his leap.

Left behind, Midori scowled. "Damn irritating tag-alongs complicating a straightforward plan."

Ami woke to the sensation of being dragged by her armpits. Cold and hard hands were pulling her backwards, lifting her upper body off the ground in the process.

Confused and alarmed, she opened her eyes.

Immediately, bright and colourful light assaulted them.

She winced, lowered her eyelids, and tried to make sense of the blurry sights with her sleep-addled mind. Squinting, she made out spinning, flickering movements. Fire? No, it didn't burn her legs, which protruded through the curved curtain. A magical diagram.

Her heart started beating faster as awareness of her current situation returned. She tensed. Who was pulling her out of that circle? The Duke?

Flinching at the thought, she raised her head to look up.

Hair –the underside of a huge black beard – occupied most of her field of view. She caught a glimpse of an ornate breastplate before the man behind her jumped backwards, out of her line of sight.

Without the support of his hands, she flopped to the ground and barely managed to prevent the back of her head from hitting the floor. Scraping her right elbow, she rolled on her side so she could keep him in her sight.

The unmistakable figure of Duke Libasheshtan was staring at her from a few steps away, the metal parts of his armour fogged over. He looked tense, ready to move, but his gauntleted hands weren't near the weapons on his belt.

"Mercury, there's no need to attack him!" Cathy called out in her mind.

What? Oh, with her Keeper powers returned, she would be able to defend herself if she felt threatened. Which she did, a little, since the Duke was free and armed. Still, he could have killed her while she was helpless. Why hadn't he? Did he want her as a prisoner, a hostage? No, that didn't make sense. He would have kept her within easy reach of his weapons in that case.

For the moment, he seemed content with keeping his distance while watching her with a wary expression.

"What's going on, Cathy?" She asked as she sat up.

"We tried to recover you as soon as we were able to scry on you again, but he broke free from the ice before the ritual finished," the swordswoman reported. "Tiger shouted at him mentally, trying to convince him not to hurt you. He seems to have listened, but he kept pulling you out of the circles." She paused. "Which might actually have been a good thing."

She glanced around, taking in her surroundings. She was still in the trap room, with a large puddle in one corner and the mace stuck to the adamantine.

Unlike before, the room was brightly lit by the blue flames of five burning magical diagrams that were partially overlapping. They were summoning spells, easily identified by the thirteen runes dancing around their circular perimeters. Her allies wouldn't have needed to use more than one, which meant someone else was trying to claim her.

Her thoughts felt sluggish and her limbs as heavy as lead. Her short bout of unconsciousness had not been enough to clear up the lethargy from her self-inflicted energy drain. Fortunately, it didn't seem to affect her dungeon heart.

With the assistance of Keeper telekinesis, she pulled herself to her feet and then summoned her transformation pen. She hesitated at the last moment. "I'm going to reapply my protective enchantments now. There will be a flash of light," she warned the Duke in order not to jeopardise their uneasy truce. Her voice sounded weak when she continued, "Mercury Power, Make Up!"

Magic surrounded her in a rush of blue and aquamarine light, energising her weary muscles. She felt refreshed and cleaned, as if all the accumulated sweat and dirt on her skin had been washed away. In the blink of an eye, her transformation finished, leaving her standing under her own strength. Instead of her customary pose though, she was covering a yawn with her hand. Despite being able to move her body effortlessly with her enhanced strength, she remained exhausted.

The Duke had taken a step back and was blinking rapidly at her, his gaze darting from her tiara down to her blue miniskirt and back up, lingering for a moment on the symbols decorating the collar of her black leotard. Finally, he focused on her face again. "Empress Mercury, I believe I owe you an apology."

Surprised, she perked up. That was a better start than she had dared to suspect.

"Your ability to shape the adamantine proves without a shadow of a doubt that you were telling the truth about having good intentions," he continued with his head bowed. "Your Majesty, I formally apologise for the disrespect shown to your title and person, and for the harm I may have unwittingly caused by refusing to hear you out."

For a moment, she stared at him with her mouth agape before breaking into a wide smile. Finally, progress on the way to a peaceful solution! "I accept your apology," she said, hoping there wasn't some protocol she was expected to know. Should she bow? It would probably be polite to return his bow. Grasping one hand with the other, she inclined her head. "I'm just glad we can finally try to end this needless conflict without anyone else getting hurt!"

The Duke sighed. "You probably shouldn't get your hopes up. I doubt that I still have much influence now that others have observed me not killing you when I had the chance." He gestured at the surplus summoning circles in the area.

"I'm very grateful you didn't," she blurted out with a faint tremble in her voice. She didn't even want to think of what would happen to her if she died while she was a Keeper. "Thank you for giving me a chance."

He shrugged. "I am not the kind of villain who would cold-bloodedly murder a child Empress appointed directly by the Light and of sufficient moral integrity to work adamantine." He paused. "Not that anyone's going to believe me when they see those burning eyes of yours."

"Sorry, but they are a side effect-"

"Never mind that now," the Duke interrupted her, his expression turning serious. "What's going on in my city? A female voice begging me not to hurt her sister," he shot her a questioning look, "also told me that I would at the very least need you alive for damage control."

"I'll have to ask someone. Please excuse me for a moment while I contact my advisers," she replied.

She concentrated on her dungeon and could immediately tell that there was no fighting currently going on. Nevertheless, there could have been trouble while - or due - to her disconnection from it. "Cathy? Is everything all right back at the dungeon?"

"Everything is currently under control here. There was a robbery and we had to scare off a dwarven assault, but there were no casualties," Cathy summarised.

Ami briefly wondered how somebody could have gotten into her dungeon and past the traps to steal from her, but the aborted invasion seemed more important. "How did you prevent- no, tell me about the city first. What's going on?"

"It's bad," the swordswoman began. "I'm not even going to try to sugar coat it. Short version: evil magic has turned almost everyone into monsters. I'll show you on my crystal ball."

Ami paled. She had expected the magic that couldn't reach her to cause problems, but nothing on that scale. Hurriedly, she focused her Keeper sight on the crystal ball Cathy was using.

It showed her youma-like creatures populating a subterranean marketplace with a floor that was glistening with moisture. The viewpoint changed, switching to the outside of a temple with barricaded doors and windows. A swarm of hissing monsters circled the building, keeping just enough distance to avoid the lit area surrounding it.

The view changed again, moving above ground. On the surface, the city looked like a ghost town. Empty streets glistened wetly, and clouds of strange fog drifted in the breeze.

"Everyone still normal has fled into the surrounding countryside," Cathy commented. "Aside from the dwarfs hiding in the various temples, and I don't know how long they can hold out."

Ami gaped in horror and really, really hoped that the victims could be saved. She didn't want to be responsible for wiping out a city! She couldn't possibly have predicted this outcome, but it would still have been impossible without her actions, so was it her fault?

She was fortunate she hadn't known about this when the adamantine had confronted her with things to feel guilty about. A moment later, she felt bad about being relieved to have unwittingly deceived the divine metal.

She closed her mouth with an audible click and shook her head. No, this was no time to feel conflicted. She had to go fix things, now!

"That bad?" the Duke asked, reading her expression.

She swallowed when she realised she had to tell him that the people he was responsible for had almost all been turned into monsters. Would he be furious and regret his decision to leave her alive? "Y-yes. Very. Everyone turned into monsters!" she blurted out before her courage could leave her.

His eyes bulged. "What?" he asked, taking a step forwards. "Explain!"

"I- I'll have someone tell you the details while I go get rid of the evil energy!" she promised, deciding to delegate the unpleasant task. "Cathy? I need you to tell the Duke what's happening outside. Gently. Also, have the warlocks ready to cast the summoning ritual on him when I raise my hands."

"Got it," came the quick reply.

She met the Duke's eyes. "This prison is currently buried underneath a mountain of ice," she told him with a sideways look at the multiple burning diagrams on the floor. "My warlocks will get you out of here. They'll start their spell when I gesture with both hands, so you will be sure it's them and not anyone else."

"Fine, it's not like I have a choice," the dwarf grumbled, crossing his arms.

She lowered her head. "Sorry, but I really need to try and fix this as soon as possible," she answered. "The spell should appear right now." She lifted both hands up to shoulder height.

On cue, a glowing blue light appeared underneath the Duke's feet and expanded into concentric circles.

At the same time, she mentally instructed one of her imps to teleport into a tunnel near the ice-covered prison. "I'll talk to you later!"

The Duke nodded once, scowling, but he didn't step out of the summoning circle.

Ami used her possession spell and turned into shadowy black lightning. Like smoke, her immaterial body passed through the almost imperceptibly tiny hole in the adamantine wall. As the obstacle slowed her down, the dungeon heart alerted her to her imp being attacked.

A gust of wind ripped flakes of hoarfrost off the masonry as a child-sized shape blurred past, letting out a drawn-out squeal. The imp was using speed-enhancing magic as she ran, her body leaning forward and her short legs moving like pistons.

Her pursuer resembled a small lion and was moving on all fours, propelling its skeleton-thin body forward with bounding leaps. It had a mane made of long quills that ran down its back to the tip of its tail. With each leap, the jostled spikes clattered against each other.

Ami heard this bony rattle when she shot out of the wall and into the fleeing imp's body. She stumbled, unprepared for seizing control in mid-sprint, and the noise got a lot closer. Alarmed, she turned her head.

The monster's ears flattened when it caught sight of her glowing eyes, and it hesitated in mid-pounce. Unable to stop while in mid-air, it crashed into her. While it was only about the same weight as the imp, it was going fast enough to topple her.

With the creature on her back, Ami skidded across the floor for a meter or so before her imp body came to a stop. Immediately, she bucked, trying to shake off the monster and expecting to feel its teeth dig into her neck any moment now.

Instead, she hear a noise that reminded her of a rusty chainsaw. An instant later, she felt a new minion link snap into place. The purring monster on top of her now counted as her underling.

She went still, blinking in surprise. She hadn't tried to hire the creature, so it must have decided to join her on its own. The influence of Metallia's dark magic, perhaps? She doubted it was just because of her back being such a nice, warm resting spot, even if the cat-like being showed no intention to vacate it.

"Shoo! Get off!" She squeaked, getting absolutely no reaction. She had to lift the creature with her Keeper hand in order to get up. Finally back on her feet, she activated her senshi transformation and summoned her visor.

The monster arched its back when the imp in front of it was suddenly wearing a Sailor Mercury uniform, its quills standing on end. It squinted suspiciously at her and sniffed the air.

Meanwhile, Ami was trying to figure out what exactly she was looking at here. On her screen, she saw a wireframe model of the creature superimposed over a much smaller outline of an ordinary house cat. She let out a breath of relief. At least, she wasn't dealing with a dwarf who had been driven insane.

Where had she and the imp ended up, anyway? She looked up from her screen to check her surroundings more closely. The masonry had an odd violet tint to it, and the corners looked smoothed and distorted. Darker veins passed through several bricks like vines that had grown wild. Overall, it didn't look like typical dwarven architecture.

Her computer beeped when it finished figuring out where she was in relation to the adamantine prison. She only had to follow down the corridor to reach the enormous cave that hadn't been there before her visit.

She started running, and the wind on her face felt cooler and cooler the closer she got to the end of the widening passage. She stopped at its exit to take in the sights before her.

Ice covered the cavern's ground, rising before her into a cone-shaped hill. Craters and spiky protrusions dotted its surface where strong magical currents had discharged themselves against the obstacle. The prison itself was buried too deeply to be visible through the mass of ice covering it, but Ami's computer insisted that it was there.

The cat mewled next to her and batted at one of the tiny motes of blackish mana that drifted through the air like soap bubbles. It dispersed into multiple smaller bubbles like a raindrop, confusing the transformed animal.

According to Ami's visor, the glowing phenomenon sparkling in the air wasn't dangerous, but simply a side effect of the elevated mana levels in the room. However, it did print out a few warnings in bright red letters about the Metallia-like nature of the residual magic.

The conclusion here was clear. Most of the evil energy had been able to flow freely into the city's channels, and without a source adding more, its concentration here had dropped.

She paused, reconsidered the cavern, started typing, and quickly ran into the limitations of having only three fingers on each hand. One teleporting ice golem, switch of possession targets, dismissed imp, applied glamour, hissing cat, and one senshi transformation later, she looked like herself again. Now equipped with the required number of digits, she felt ready to analyse the location efficiently.

It certainly looked vastly different from before her imprisonment, with wider spaces, fungal-looking rock formations, and a blueish-violet colour theme. Chaotic magic, in her limited experience, generally didn't react easily with pure rock and stone. How much magic would have been necessary to create these results in the available time?

The result of her calculations appeared on the screen, and she stared at it in disbelief. There had to be a mistake somewhere. She didn't have that much magic to draw upon. Even if she did, she would explode trying to use that much! What was she missing?

Luna had mentioned about her senshi powers still maturing. Theoretically, that could mean that there was some regulation mechanism linked to her body that limited inflow so she couldn't hurt herself. If the body were disconnected somehow, then the mana would be able to flow at full blast.

She shook her head and closed her palmtop. That was mere speculation. It was much more likely that she wasn't taking into account some unknown factor. Like the fact that she wasn't dealing with dungeon architecture here, or that Metallia's dark magic was involved.

The cat-monster got bored and approached her, lowering its head.

Quickly raising her hands, she managed to block an affectionate head-bump from the mutated animal at the last moment. "No! Watch the quills!" she protested.

Prickly fate averted, she considered the mini-lion. Its minion link was evidence for her having some influence over the dark magic that contaminated the city. If she could use this connection to draw the spread-out magic back to herself, she could stop it from doing more damage.

She nodded to herself. It was her best plan for the moment, and she could even use the dwarven ritual chamber for her idea, since it was built for drawing in magic.

Ami hadn't taken into account that she would find the casting chamber occupied. Its entrance door hadn't been replaced yet, and splashes, loud screeches, and brawling noises came from the open doorway. Sporadic flashes of colour lit the corridor outside, accompanied by hisses and booms. There was shouting, but it consisted of disconnected words that did not really make sense.

She pressed herself flat against the wall near the entrance, not wanting to be noticed by the creatures yet. "Cathy? What's going on?" she asked, knowing that her warlocks were tracking her with their crystal balls.

"The monsters have all been steadily getting more aggressive and territorial for a while now," the swordswoman replied. "I don't know why."

Crossing her arms, Ami whispered, "Shabon Spray," thrust her palms forward, and launched a stream of bubbles past the doorway.

They collided with the corridor's wall, bursting into a tide of grey mist that billowed outwards. The thick cloud rolled through the entrance into the ritual chamber.

The noises from the chamber changed, and not just because the expanding fog muted sounds. Creatures, visible as roughly humanoid shadows past the edge of the cloud, retreated with small, reluctant steps.

One red, rotund individual hesitated, sniffing as he waited for the mist to envelop him. Solid yellow eyes narrowed as he turned his head and looked around, unable to see. With an angry snort, he went down on all fours and catapulted himself out of the cloud with a frog-like leap.

After she was fairly certain that the creatures wouldn't just charge into her fog, she felt secure enough to enter the chamber. Unhindered by her own fog, she could get a proper view of the room and its occupants, who she was already calling "youma" in her head.

Some of them were wrestling, rolling around on the ground as they grappled, punched, and bit each other. Water fountained as the fighting creatures struggled within shallow puddles.

The fighting looked brutal, and so she was happy that she couldn't see any traces of blood in the water. Then again, she wasn't entirely sure if youma blood didn't turn into dust outside of the body.

A ball of pink fire sailed past a meter above, having missed its intended target. It hit the side of one of the terrace-like platforms, prompting a nearby monkey-like creature to shake its yellow-furred fist in the direction of the offender.

Ami let her gaze move around, noting with some relief that not everybody was fighting. Dozens of the creatures were hanging back on various platforms and pillars, watching the fights. Others were merely snarling and hissing at their opponents, displaying sharp teeth and claws in order to scare them off.

"Jadeite, do you know why they are fighting each other? Is this normal youma behaviour?" she mentally directed a question at the member of her team most knowledgeable about the topic.

"They may be establishing a hierarchy," the dark general replied. "They are also naturally vicious, so perhaps they are just bored. I haven't ever had to deal with youma who weren't already under someone's command yet."

She could imagine him shrugging, judging from his tone. Since he had no immediately helpful information, she had to gather more herself. Was the concentrated evil energy in the air perhaps riling them up?

She tapped a few keys on her computer, and a new overlay appeared on her visor. Architecture and living beings faded into a dull grey, while concentrations of magical energy appeared in vibrant colours. The brightest knots and streams showed up in the youma and in the runic patterns forming the chamber's arcane diagrams, followed closely by the water pooling on the ground.

Seeing the numbers on the energy's composition, she frowned. The balance was wrong, consisting of a vast majority of Metallia's dark energy, rather than of her own, or even of chaotic unbound mana. There shouldn't have been that much of the dark goddess' power in the mix.

The numbers shifted by a minuscule amount even as Ami analysed the interplay between the various energies, and she suddenly understood what was happening. Metallia's energy was slowly absorbing the other types, turning it into more of itself in the process.

Unbidden, her mind imagined the conversion process continuing for as long as it found available magic, sweeping out from the city like a tide of darkness that engulfed the planet.

Paling, she started typing as quickly as she could, running the numbers. To her relief, her worries were baseless. The conversion process wasn't very efficient, at least without a guiding intelligence directing it to absorb magical power on purpose. In all but a very high mana environment, the evil energy would dissipate faster than it could reproduce.

She let out the breath she had been holding. In the short run, having a larger proportion of Metallia's power in the mix instead of chaotic mana had even been beneficial. Instead of turning into jumbles of randomly arranged limbs and organs, the afflicted dwarfs had turned into functional creatures.

A closer scan had her correct herself. Mostly functional creatures. They weren't exactly pure youma and used magic to make up for some deficiencies in their anatomy.

That discovery prompted another train of thought that made her narrow her eyes in suspicion. Focusing on her Keeper sight, she stumbled as her point of view moved outside of her body. From higher up, she could observe the youma's behaviour as a whole.

There was definitely a pattern to their actions. The most intense fighting was happening near the pools of water and the mana-gathering nodes, with the strongest creatures defending their spots. Even as she watched, a huge, gargoyle-like creature grabbed two challengers at once and smashed them into each other repeatedly before tossing them into the crowd.

Her bad feeling intensified. They were fighting over the most mana-rich locations in the chamber. All youma needed magic to sustain themselves, and the massive influx of magical power pouring into the city had stopped when she broke out of her prison. They were turning on each other because they were hungry!

She directed her attention to the losers of those battles. They stood or sat some distance away, licking their wounds. In some cases literally so. Scratches and bruises were fading quickly, but regenerating wounds also cost them mana and worsened their hunger.

Looking at their focused, covetous expressions, she feared that they would get desperate enough to try again eventually and get hurt again. She didn't want to see the results of them no longer having enough mana to heal or to keep their bodies going. They were still innocent dwarfs caught in this disaster, after all.

She needed to step in to prevent more injury and death. The mist concealing her came apart as she willed it to go away, blowing away as if a cold storm was coming from her body. "STOP FIGHTING!" she shouted, her voice echoing through the chamber.

The closest creatures whirled to face her, crouched, ready to either attack or run. Those further away turned more slowly, some only moving their misshapen heads. There was some hopping, shuffling, and pushing in the back rows as some youma tried to get a better look at her.

With everyone staring at her, her cheeks heated up under all the attention. On the positive side, her shout had interrupted the ongoing fights, as the combatants were focused on her now. Belatedly, she realised that she hadn't really planned what she would do once she had stopped the violence.

"You!" came an angry screech from the direction of one of the mana nodes. A dragon-themed youma, covered from head to toes in red scales, took a step forward and gnashed her teeth.

The youma around her gave her room in deference. Then again, perhaps they simply knew to avoid the long, bat-like wings that snapped open with a whip-like crack.

The crimson youma launched herself into the air with a furious wingbeat and dived towards Ami, clawed fingers extended.

"Stop!" the blue-haired girl shouted even as she placed her feet wider apart, ready to dodge. Getting no reaction from her opponent, she hurriedly fired a Shabon Spray Freezing spell at the incoming target.

The slender youma rolled sideways with deceptive speed, wings almost vertical, gliding alongside the elongated blast of glowing aquamarine bubbles. Gem-like ruby eyes flashed angrily as red scales fogged over from the proximity of the freezing attack.

The manoeuvre didn't leave Ami enough time to cast another spell. She wished she had restocked her Keeper storage after losing its contents during her imprisonment so she could use a readied attack from storage. Dodge? She didn't want to look weak while she was surrounded by potential attackers. Instead, she intercepted the attacker's clawed hands by catching them with her own.

The weight and momentum of the descending youma slammed against her palms, and needle-sharp claws dug into the skin of her wrists as their fingers intertwined. Nevertheless, while she looked like a blue-haired teenage girl, her body was an ice golem with senshi enchantments under her glamour.

Her arms were forced back, but not by much, and her knees bent as she cushioned the impact, but they didn't buckle.

With a surprised yelp, the youma tried to arrest her forward motion, but something in her arms made a cracking noise. Barely slowed, she crashed into Ami headfirst.

The young Keeper's boots squeaked as she skidded backwards, pushed by the force of the impact. Piercing pain came from the layer of fake skin right below her collarbone.

She gulped when she saw that the youma's short, straight horns were buried in her chest down to their bases. Possessing a golem body was teaching her reckless, unhealthy combat habits.

Grabbing her attacker by the shoulders, she pushed.

The stuck horns came free with a soft popping noise, and water trickled out from the wound.

The dazed youma extended a long, prehensile tongue and started lapping up the clear liquid, to Ami's disgusted embarrassment.

Grimacing, she shoved harder against the scaly creature's shoulders, propelling her away and into the ring of other youma who had approached them while she was distracted. Warily, she slowly spun around to get a better look at the beings circling her.

Each of the individuals looked distinct from the rest, differing in size, colour, and number of limbs. Some were wearing remains of their armour or had partially melded with it, while others were clad in tatters of robes. A third group, mostly consisting of those who deviated most strongly from normal dwarven proportions, wore nothing at all. In most cases, fur, scales, feathers, crystals, or a combination thereof preserved their modesty, but Ami still tried not to look too closely.

In turn, the youma lowered their heads whenever she faced them, avoiding eye contact. They seemed scared to approach her, but also curious enough to get closer.

She watched them for hints of aggression, but didn't spot any directed at herself. The dragon-girl must have been an exception. She shot a glance at her defeated attacker, who was slinking off into the crowd. "Wait!" she called after her. The red-scaled youma had talked, even if it had only been one word. Perhaps communication was possible.

Most of the creatures around her reacted to her exclamation, some freezing up, others stopping their sluggish approach.

Wide-eyed, she let her gaze sweep over the crowd she had unintentionally addressed. She had trouble reading the less human facial expressions, but sideways-tilted heads and raised eyebrows could be taken as signs that they were waiting for her to continue. "Can you understand me?" she asked, cautiously optimistic.

"Most of them can," a voice that sounded as if the speaker's throat was clogged-up with slime replied.

Following the sound, she spotted the speaker standing on one of the tallest pillars looming above the chamber's terraces, some distance behind the crowd.

He was a squat figure wearing a robe that looked as if it had been stitched together from four huge, greasy-looking leaves. His long, dwarven beard consisted of slimy foam, its white colour contrasting sharply with his goblin-like complexion. Seeing that he had her attention, he continued, "Don't expect them to hold a conversation, however. They aren't smart enough to put more than a few words together. Frankly, I suspect they are merely accessing the memories of who they used to be to associate words with meaning."

She noted that he obviously didn't have that problem. He was also the only of the youma holding any kind of tool or weapon; in this case a long golden wizard's staff. "Who are you?" she asked.

"My name is Mengolin. I used to be the court wizard of Salthalls before receiving this dark blessing," he answered, inclining his head in a polite nod. "I came up with a clever plan when I realised that my defeat was inevitable. I protected only my mind and let my body change, certain that my unfortunate brethren would be unable to see through the ruse. I think I succeeded admirably."

"I – um- congratulations?" she replied hesitantly, feeling that his proud grin and content demeanour contradicted his words. She would have expected a dwarf who had been transformed against his will to be more hostile and upset about it.

Among the youma surrounding her, some had turned their heads to listen when Mengolin spoke up. He wasn't able to keep their interest, and they resumed staring at Ami with curious, hungry expressions.

Nervous about the creatures inching ever closer, she asked, "Do you know why they are acting the way they are?"

"Yes, of course," Mengolin said. "You are a beacon of power and authority. As expected of an Empress. Of course they want to bask in your presence."

She flushed, unsure how to react to the blatant flattery.

"Empress," a nearby youma with long floppy ears picked out a single word from his sentence.

"Empress," another repeated, with a hint of recognition in her voice.

"Empress?" three more youma asked simultaneously. "Empress!"

She suddenly realised that Mengolin might not have been trying to flatter her, but had been accurately describing how she felt to the youma's senses. She was radiating more dark power than anything else in the area, and that included the drying-up mana nodes. Which was probably the reason why the cat had joined her, now that she thought about it. She had been feeding it.

"Empress! Empress! Empress!" More and more youma were joining in, their distinct voices melding into a deafening chant.

The eyes of a stocky youma who was the approximate shape of a penguin suddenly widened. His maw opened as a sudden flash of insight hit him, and his metal armour rattled when he dropped to one knee.

She could feel a new minion bond forming as he bowed his head.

His submissive gesture triggered a chain reaction. First, the creatures next to him aped the gesture, and then the movement spread outwards through the crowd like a wave, accompanied by the rumble of many knees hitting the ground.

Within moments, she was surrounded by a sea of kneeling youma and inundated by the feeling of minion bonds snapping into place.

Blinking, she turned in a circle and saw nothing but new underlings. Even Mengolin up on his pillar had joined her, much to her surprise. Concentrating, she sensed only one exception inside the chamber.

Her previous opponent, the red-scaled youma, was climbing one of the pillars. Body wrapped partially around the stone column, she snarled at Ami upon noticing her attention.

"That one's different, your Majesty," Mengolin commented, following the blue-haired teenager's gaze. "Used to be a fairy. Doesn't know how to behave in the presence of nobility."

"Fairy? But-" The only fairies she could reasonably expect to be in the area were the diplomatic corps from the Shining Concord Empire, whom she had asked to talk with the dwarfs on her behalf. It made a certain amount of sense that a baron would send them on to his liege, rather than negotiating with them himself. "Oh no. They were here when this happened!"

Guiltily, she tried to figure out which one of the sisters she was looking at. Visually, there was little to identify her by. The redhead perhaps, judging from her colour? "Anise? Roselle? Dandel? Cerasse?" she tried.

The mutated fairy twitched when she heard the names. She swept her gaze over the crowd, batted her wings, and took to the air. Keeping close to the outer walls, she started flying in a lazy circle.

Ami didn't know what to make of that reaction until the dragon-girl darted sideways, out through the doorway, and disappeared down the corridor. "And now she's trying to find her sisters," she speculated, resisting the urge to give chase. Her reason for coming to this chamber hadn't become less urgent just because there was one more issue to deal with.

"Cathy, please have some warlocks locate the fairy sisters. Thanks!" she delegated, somewhat assuaging her conscience.

Right now, her first priority was stopping the dark energy from claiming more victims, and then she needed to keep the transformed dwarfs from hurting each other. "Mengolin, I need to use this casting chamber. Can you help me operate it?"

"Your wish is my command, Empress!" the former dwarf replied. "You, you and you!" he shouted, singling out three of the youma. "Start cleaning up the crystal lattices over there, the Empress demands it! All of you on the northern dais," he shouted, whirling around to a different group. "Move! Get off there!"

Seeing that he had the situation well in hand, she mentally contacted the other specialist whose knowledge would be invaluable for the task. "Jadeite? What's the best way to exert control over dark energy that has spread over a large area?"

She didn't have to wait long for an answer. "Depends on what you want to achieve, but in general, you first need…"

Last edited: Nov 24, 2017

Disaster Relief

A pitch-black sun made of evil energy floated below the arched ceiling of the dwarven ritual chamber, the truck-sized sphere radiating a bright pale light despite its colour.

Eyes blazing crimson and skirt whipping in the wind, Ami stood directly underneath the concentrated dark energy, her arms raised towards it. With her will, she forced the ball of magic to contract even as it struggled to escape her grasp.

The wind emitted by the sphere intensified, pushing dust and debris outwards, across the magical circle surrounding her. Pebbles burst into splinters as they touched the glowing diagram, except for those lucky enough to cross the section that had just blown up.

Ami clenched her teeth as she considered the sizzling scar that marred the intricate designs on the ground. She shouldn't have rushed so much and tried to force the issue.

"Almost done," Mengolin shouted in his phlegm-choked voice. "A little bit more. Done!"

The scraping of stone against stone cut off as the chamber's rising and lowering half pillars locked into place. Circuits inscribed onto their surface at different altitudes linked up with the main arcane pattern on the ground, compensating for the damage.

The ball of dark magic above Ami stopped seething and threatening to burst out of its containment.

"Thank you," she replied in relief, breathing deeply. "Good work."

With a faint smile, she stared up at the concentrated mixture of Metallia's energy and chaotic magic, feeling the satisfaction of a job well done.

Smoke and sparks rose from the curved scar on the ground where crystalline lines had burst under the strain of too much power coming in too fast.

She revised her assessment to a job done quickly, which amounted to the same thing in this case. By co-opting the city's amazing infrastructure, she had been able to suck the magical contamination out of the environment within a matter of minutes. It would claim no additional victims.

Cries of awe came from the entrance to the chamber, where a crowd of youma eyed the ball of contained magic with longing gazes.

At their sight, her satisfaction faded, replaced by dread. The transformed dwarfs in the city would not be happy that she had just snatched away their food.

The frost patterns on the walls shrank and faded as if the stone was sucking them in, the mist cleared, and the puddles on the ground drained away with a slurping noise.

Tilia's sharp senses noticed the oily pressure of dark magic rapidly fading from the area, leaving the air dry and empty. She should have felt relief, but instead she felt an unfamiliar void in her stomach.

Judging from the loud wailing that echoed all around her, she wasn't the only one to notice.

The hand she was holding twitched in her grasp, trying to pull away.

She looked down, suppressing a wince at the sight of her yellowed, ridged skin that reminded her of a chicken's foot. With practice she had gained over the last few hours, she pushed aside her disgust and despair. It could have been worse. At least she could still think clearly, unlike her sister. The one sister she had managed to keep track of in this mess.

Melissa tried to pull away again, and Tilia tightened her grip.

Bones, soft and malleable, gave way underneath her fingers as flesh yielded to the pressure. The first time that had happened, Tilia had a small panic attack, believing that she had seriously injured her sister.

Melissa had been fine, though. While she looked relatively unchanged, aside from being a light shade of blue all over, her body now had the approximate consistency of a sponge. Her flesh compressed and stretched as easily as it popped back to its initial shape after being deformed, apparently without causing pain or lasting harm.

At least, the mutated fairy wasn't showing any discomfort from having her wrist squeezed down to the approximate thickness of her index finger. She was examining the surrounding walls with a searching gaze and trying to move in the direction of a humid-looking corridor with an arched ceiling.

In that direction, two groaning mutants were lying on the floor, their limbs showing large tooth marks.

"Wait. No! Why would you even want to go that way?" Tilia said, maintaining her grip.

Her sister turned her head and growled at her, baring pointed teeth and narrowing her eyes.

Her lips twitched, ready to twist into a snarl. How dare she challenge- no, stop, calm down. There was no need to fight. It was only the stupid dark magic making her angry. Calm down, calm down, calm down. She focused on her breathing until she was sure she could control herself before she met her sister's eyes. "Why don't we go that way instead?" she suggested, pointing down a less ominous passage. "There's no more magic around here, and I think there's a temple in that direction. We could get some help there."

Melissa blinked at her a few times, as if confused by her sister's hopeful tone. After a few seconds, she turned away, her expression blank, and continued looking around.

"A temple is pretty magical. There might be food?" Tilia tried again.

A sudden voice in her head distracted her from her efforts.

"Everyone, this is Empress Mercury speaking," the owner of the mental voice introduced herself.

Melissa's arm jerked in Tilia's grip, and the mutated fairy's spongy wings lashed around like flexible whips as she twisted and turned, searching for the speaker.

Tilia ducked her head as one of the wings flew right at her face, elongated by centrifugal forces. She sighed. Leave it to the dark empress to make her life more difficult again.

"If you have been affected by the transformative magic, then you may be feeling hungry right now. I am going to place sources of magic that can satisfy that hunger at…"

Tilia listened as Mercury named a number of locations that the locals would presumably recognise, but that meant nothing to the visiting fairies.

A moment later, she stumbled when Melissa made a far more enthusiastic attempt to run off.

"Stop! Wait!" Tilia ordered, getting an angry hiss and a glower in reply.

"And don't fight each other, there should be enough for everyone," Mercury continued. "Also, please don't fight or hurt the unaffected dwarfs if you encounter them. Or, um, at least bring them to the magical crystals." Her voice was wavering a little as she continued, "Those should have the same effect as the water had. Just don't kill anyone, please!"

"That fiend!" Tilia shouted. "She's trying to get even more people corrupted!"

An angry snarl came from Melissa as she struggled harder to pull her along.

"Wait! Where are you going?" Tilia protested. "You don't know how to get to any of those places. Just come along with me, the temple will be easy to find!"

Melissa slowly raised her free hand and pointed at a few transformed dwarfs in the distance, all of whom were moving in the same direction.

"You want to follow them?" Tilia asked, disturbed by the way her sister's extended arm was sagging at the middle like a wet noodle. Unfortunately, she couldn't think of any good reason why that plan wouldn't work. "Oh, all right," she conceded. Melissa didn't look as if she was willing to budge on this, and she didn't want her to get them both lost again with that gross slime wave dashing ability she had somehow acquired.

Satisfied, the blue-coloured girl took the lead, stomping after the creatures more familiar with the area.

Still holding her wrist, Tilia followed, keeping an eye out for her other sisters. She wasn't actually opposed to feeding, but she worried about the cost. This was the dark empress offering them food, which could be seen as a kind of payment. Wouldn't accepting turn them into minions, just like poor Camilla? No, they would have to render some kind of service to Mercury for that to happen, if she understood things right.

Melissa started pulling harder when Tilia's steps slowed and her expression grew more worried.

The dark empress had given specific instructions. Don't fight and don't hurt anyone. Could going along with those instructions count, even if it had been your intention all along?

Tilia felt that would be evil and unfair. Given they were dealing with a Keeper here, that was enough to make her believe it would indeed count. "We can't go along with her orders. We'll have to beat someone up on the way," she thought out loudly, which earned her a confused look from her sister. "And- yes! It's not payment if we steal it!"

When the pulse of flame-shaped magic faded, a gust of warm and humid air hit Duke Libasheshtan's face. His surroundings had changed, and he was in a dungeon. Empress Mercury's dungeon. A shiver ran down his neck even though he knew that he shouldn't be in danger. Nevertheless, the three warlocks standing at equidistant points of the magical circle he found himself in didn't exactly make him feel safe.

He couldn't help wonder if the three men really were warlocks when he took in their appearance.

The ornate staves and the beards fit, though their clothing didn't. They were wearing what was either large loincloths or very short skirts – he couldn't tell the difference under the mass of the garish glass beads and feathers covering them.

As their scrawny physiques and maggoty complexions assaulted his eyes, he instinctively took a defensive stance, his hand moving to his sword.

In response, the warlocks backed away, lowering their staves at him as they created distance. A few spear-wielding orcs that had been standing further back suddenly looked more alert, their stances less slouched.

The Duke's eyes darted about as checked his surroundings. He wasn't looking for a fight, but if one was inevitable, he didn't want to be blind-sided. The room itself was large, with a wide-open area for the magic circle on the ground, and a high ceiling. No cover near him. No shadows for enemies to hide in either, as the place was well lit by a number of lamps protected by cages of icicles. He did spot two closed doors with metal inlays, noting them as potential exits.

"Stand down. No fighting!" a female voice ordered from behind him.

He whirled around, reluctantly taking his eyes off the potential enemies before him.

A woman was sitting at the head of a long table laden with candles, books, and other odd tools of the warlock trade. His first impression was that she looked like an older version of Empress Mercury who had picked up weightlifting as a hobby and had fallen into a vat of orange paint. For a brief, incredulous moment, he actually mistook the black strips of cloth that formed her leotard for a part of her stripe pattern, and heat rose to his cheeks.

"I am Tiger, Mercury's sister," she introduced herself, the corners of her lips moving upwards as she noticed his blush.

He noticed two short horns on her head as she nodded in greeting.

She looked at the warlocks and the orcs and made a shooing motion with her hand. "Leave us. Your presence is no longer required."

"At once, Princess." The creatures bowed and filed out of the room closing the door behind them with a heavy thud.

They had left him his weapons and followed her orders without hesitation, even if that meant leaving their unarmed princess alone with him. Obviously, they believed her to be more than able to defend herself if necessary. She was dangerous, so politely averting his gaze wasn't an option even though her relative lack of clothing made him want to cringe.

"Your Highness," he replied with a terse bow that was just deep enough to satisfy formalities.

"Please, have a seat," Tiger said invitingly, gesturing for him to come closer. There was an unoccupied chair at the corner right next to her.

He approached her cautiously, unsure whether or not he could trust her. She had pleaded for the safety of Empress Mercury and looked similar to her sister, but did she share the latter's convictions?

"So, my sister told me that you are aware of her true alignment. Don't tell the other minions, most of them aren't. They probably wouldn't believe you anyway, but there's no reason to cause unnecessary problems."

Well, that answered his question. "Agreed." He paused for a moment. "What, exactly, is my current status here? Am I a prisoner, or am I allowed leaving?"

"Huh, Mercury actually didn't specify. Bringing you here was simply the fastest way to get you out of that box." She shrugged. "Consider yourself a guest for now."

"In that case, I would appreciate transport back to my city as soon as possible," he stated. Salthalls was going through the greatest disaster in its history, and he wasn't there to help.

"Oh. I was hoping I could convince you to stay and negotiate on our behalf first. Mercury still wants a truce with your kingdom, or at least with your Duchy. Even a ceasefire long enough to leave your lands would do." She pointed at a large rectangular mirror that was resting against a pile of books. "I have a variant crystal ball right there," she said, sounding hopeful.

"Negotiate? This isn't the time for that! I need to know what's going on at home. I need to get back there, aid my people, and get the situation under control!"

Tiger's expression softened. "I understand that you are worried and want to do your duty, but the best way to help your people is to get the other dwarfs to back off," she said.

"I don't-" he began, but the princess raised a hand to stop him.

"Please, let me explain. Mercury is already doing everything she can to bring the situation under control. She would be much more effective and could bring more resources to bear if she didn't have to worry about her dungeon being attacked."

He shook his head. "That may be true, but you are neglecting important aspects of the situation. First, the people who haven't been turned into mindless monstrosities won't cooperate with your sister. I need to be there to keep them from charging off into danger. I'll also need to contact the dwarfs who managed to flee and arrange for supplies, food and shelter from the surrounding villages."

The black-striped woman didn't look entirely convinced yet.

"Second, there were over thirty thousand dwarfs in the city, and she turned almost all of them into demons! Do you really think there's anything I can say that will prevent the King from trying to stop her before she can do it again? Especially when my credibility is shot because I'm contacting him from inside his enemy's dungeon?"

"Oh. That's…" Tiger trailed off with an embarrassed sigh, her fingers drumming the top of the wooden table as she thought. She looked up suddenly. "Turning them back might help?"

He sucked in a sharp breath. "Turning them- you mean curing the transformed people? Is that even possible?"

Tiger nodded. "I think so. I have an idea that would get them back to normal. More or less."

"What?" That qualifier didn't exactly reassure him. He searched her face for any hints of deception, unwilling to allow himself to hope just yet. "Please, do go on."

"Putting them into a temple should restore their minds. At least it did for me." She paused, putting a finger to her chin and looked thoughtful. "Well, at least I think the Avatar's mantle counts as a temple, so there's that."

"Wait, you were…" The Duke trailed off, observing her more closely as he pondered the implications. Had Tiger been turned into an insane monster just like the transformed citizens? He imagined her without her horns and her odd colouration, which left her looking like a normal human.

However, she didn't have any of the strange deformities, protrusions, or extra limbs that afflicted his poor vassals, aside from her horns.

He inspected her more closely until he realised that staring at her body like that might give her the wrong impression. "You used to be human?" he asked, his thoughts racing. It would explain how she could be Mercury's sister despite looking demonic. It would also mean that the empress had been experimenting with the foul magic that had contaminated his city before.

"Oh, no, I was never human. I'm adopted," Tiger explained, completely derailing his train of thought.

"But the family resemblance!" he protested, gaping.

"That's more complicated. I'm a magical being called a youma – which is what your citizens have been partially turned into. Anyway, we youma have malleable forms." She perked up. "Which is actually the second half of my solution. The body fits the self-image. Restore their minds, and their bodies will snap back to their original forms. The only thing stopping that is partial transformations and chaotic mutations, but we could probably turn them into full youma with a sufficient dose of dark magic."

"They would only appear like normal dwarfs, but they would still be youma, wouldn't they?" the Duke asked, not nearly as enthusiastic about her plan as she looked.

"Well, yes, it's not a perfect solution." Tiger shrugged. "But you have to admit that sane and normal-looking would be a great improvement over their current condition. Oh, I have to tell my sister to try this!"

The large park in front of the dwarven palace's east face was crowded with youma. They circled a tall spike of black crystal that jutted out of the ground, trampling the flowerbeds as they basked in the magic it gave off.

"Everyone new, move to the fountain and follow Mareki's instructions," Ami shouted from the balcony overlooking the area. "She's the one waving the big blue flag!"

A number of youma who had just entered recognised her from the huge posters of empress Mercury she had positioned at all entrances. New minion links formed, and the majority of the group moved to follow her instructions.

A new group of youma rushed towards the remaining feral mutants and started luring them away with splinters of the tall black crystal.

Ami's gaze darted towards the centre, where more of her recently hired help was carrying wounded and weak youma towards the source of magical power. She swallowed heavily when she spotted the baby and toddler-sized creatures that some held in their arms. "Widen the lanes! They need to stay open at all times!"

The crumbling of rock behind her distracted her. Tiger stepped out of the dust cloud, letting go of a coughing Duke Libasheshtan. "Did my idea work?" she asked, looking around curiously as if expecting to find a cured dwarf somewhere near Ami on the balcony.

She shook her head. "I need to run some experiments to see if it's safe before I try it on people. The idea is sound, but I have to address the more urgent problems first." She gestured at the crowds below.

The Duke uncrossed his arms, nodding in approval. "I won't complain about putting the safety of my citizens first. What's the situation and how can I help?"

Ami hesitated for a moment as she wondered where to start. "Well, the magic that contaminated the city is over there now." She pointed at the black crystal. "At least part of it. It is no longer a threat."

The Duke's clenched jaws relaxed slightly.

"Pacifying the youma- I mean the transformed citizens – is the most urgent remaining issue." Her shoulders drooped. "They need mana to live, they are aggressive, and when there isn't enough mana, they fight each other for it. They also join my forces and follow my orders if they meet me in person."

The Duke grimaced at that, visibly unhappy at the idea.

"I'm managing a few sites like this one, but most of the city remains outside of my reach. They ignored my telepathic messages, but I think you may have more luck. They should be used to listening to your orders."

He nodded. "That makes sense, but I can't send telepathic messages."

"I'll have a solution for that in a moment," she replied.

An imp appeared with a burst of green magic. The coverall-clad creature was small, her helmet coming only up to Ami's waist, but she immediately invaded the larger girl's personal space and started doing a strange sort of dance.

Ami raised her arms awkwardly to avoid the imp bumping into them and shifted left and right as the small worker cavorted around her. She almost lost her balance when she was bumped in the side while she was trying to avoid her left foot getting stepped on.

"What are you doing?" the Duke asked with a dubious expression as he watched her undignified dodges and stumbles.

"Claiming territory to build on," Ami explained, bending sideways to prevent a small elbow from colliding with her belly. "I always count as a piece of my own land, so the imp can claim a piece of terrain right next to me while I'm touching the ground."

The small creature giggled and waved her arms more frequently, forcing Ami to dodge and twist at even more awkward angles.

"The evil little critter is being annoying on purpose, isn't she?" the Duke growled.

"Probably," Ami admitted. "The imps are quite mischievous when- ah, here we go."

A puff of aquamarine steam rose from the ground around her feet and dissipated before it could billow out much further. The floor itself had also gained a bluish tint that was more pronounced between the seams of the precisely cut dwarven floor tiles.

With a pout, the imp moved further away from Ami and continued her claiming dance in order to expand the young Keeper's new territory.

"I have a little terrain now, which will last for as long as I remain on it," Ami explained as she focused on her treasury. "It's just large enough for a tiny scavenger room. Please step back."

A muffled swear came from the Duke when a head-sized bulb shattered the recoloured floor from below. Shaking off the broken shards, the flesh-coloured knob shot upwards on a fast-growing, veined stalk. Two lids peeled back completely, revealing a glassy eyeball that turned to stare at the Duke.

He took a few steps away, his cheeks paling as he stared at the undulating construct. "What the hell? How is that- that gross thing going to help?"

"That's a scavenger room. Touching the eyeball allows the user to send mental messages," Ami explained, "It's usually used to lure in potential recruits. I hoped you could use it to contact your citizens."

"I see," the Duke replied, approaching the eyestalk with a blank expression. "Do I have to take my gauntlets off?"

"I don't think so," Ami replied, giving him an encouraging smile.

"Small mercies…" He placed his right palm on top of the glistening orb, which ducked and quivered under the weight. "This feels odd, but- yes, I think I understand how it's supposed to work."

Another imp ran up to Ami's side, pulling a crystal orb from her backpack and offering it to the blue-haired girl.

Making sure to keep at least one foot touching her claimed territory, Ami approached the Duke. "Here, I'll show you where I placed the big crystals," she said as she held the glowing device up for him. "That way, you can explain to your citizens where to find them. I hope you can convince them to stop fighting and to bring the injured, too."

The Duke slid his fingertips over the giant eyeball, minimising contact despite wearing gauntlets. "I can certainly give it a try."

Cathy's voice spoke up in her mind, "I'm getting reports from several warlocks that the youma have suddenly started moving towards your crystals."

The Duke twitched in surprise and looked up, not having expected the mental message.

"We aren't sure whether that's because they respect the Duke's authority or whether he's simply better at describing the way," Cathy added.

"Well, that should only take a moment to test," Tiger said. She looked at her adopted sister. "You'll have to hide yourself."

Ami's face lit up in understanding. "Ah, you are going to make him confront a feral youma face to face? Right, just give me a moment." She moved into a claimed corner of the balcony and created a cheap room with three thin but opaque walls and a door.

Tiger disappeared as the walls grew around Ami, smoothly rising from the ground. A few seconds after the construction finished, the black and orange youma teleported back in. As usual, she was covered by a rapidly disintegrating rock shell, but this time, it was larger than usual.

As the crumbling stone covering peeled off, it revealed Tiger and a slightly smaller humanoid with a pink exoskeleton.

The new youma had been grabbed from behind and was hissing and spitting as she tried to wriggle free from the restrictive bear hug.

"Hurry, this thing is pointy!" Tiger shouted at the Duke, head held sideways to prevent spines from digging into her cheek. "Any day now!"

The dwarf turned away from the huge eyeball, stood straight, and met the captive's eyes. "Hold!" he said in a commanding voice. "I am Duke Libasheshtan, the rightful ruler of this city. You are safe, so cease your struggling. You will not be harmed."

The captured youma's head turned towards him, eyes with cat-like pupils narrowing as they looked him up and down. The creature growled at him and struggled to break free.

"Doesn't look like it's working- ow!" Tiger flinched as her captive managed to jab a thorn-tipped heel into her shin. Reflexively, she withdrew her leg and lost her balance.

With a burst of strength, the pink youma broke free from her loosening grasp. She leapt forward, out of Tiger's reach, and snarled at the Duke again. Her next leap carried her towards the armoured figure, claws extended.

"Definitely not working!" he shouted as he ducked behind the questionable cover of the undulating eyestalk, perhaps hoping its sheer repulsiveness would ward away the attacker.

The youma landed in a crouch, teeth bared. Her muscles tensed as she readied herself to pounce on him, but then she went still for no discernible reason. Blinking in confusion, she slowly rose back to her full height – just in time for Tiger to land on her back and tackle her to the ground.

The tiger-striped youma let out a surprised yelp when the pink-shelled creature underneath her vanished without warning and she dropped the remaining distance to the ground.

"I've got her!" Ami shouted from behind the walls surrounding her. "She got recruited somehow," she explained in a puzzled tone, absently selling off her temporary shelter.

"Recruited?" Duke Libasheshtan asked, turning to face the rectangular construction that was melting away like heated wax.

"Yes, I noticed a new link with the dungeon heart forming and placed her into my storage," Ami explained, stepping over the last remnants of the fading walls. "She is safe; I'll let her out later."

"Why would she suddenly choose to become your minion when she couldn't see you?" he asked.

"It happened when she landed on the claimed ground," Tiger pointed out, tapping the floor next to where she was sitting.

Ami nodded thoughtfully. "That makes sense. The dungeon heart must have treated her like a mindless neutral creature, such as giant beetles and flies. They get recruited when they enter dungeon territory."

"Mindless creatures…" the Duke muttered angrily under his breath. He shook his head, squared his shoulders, and sighed as he looked at her. "I can't believe I'm suggesting this, but my poor citizens would be safer as your minions than the way they are now. Could you please send out your imps to claim more of the city?"

Surprised, Ami blinked and looked over at the imp that was still doing her claiming dance, barely a few metres from where she had started. "I could, but the city counts as enemy territory. They would make barely any progress."

"I see." He watched the capering imp proceed at a snail's pace for several long moments, stroking his beard with a conflicted look on his face. His shoulders slumped as he seemed to reach a decision. "Guess there's no choice," he said, almost too quietly to hear.

Ami turned towards him in alarm as he stepped before her and bowed deeply.

"This is a terrible idea, but it is also simply acknowledging the facts. Empress Mercury of the Avatar Islands! I, Thol Libasheshtan, Duke of the city of Salthalls, formally surrender to you. The city of Salthalls is yours by right of conquest."

She gaped at him in surprise and dawning horror. "What?"

"Usually, there would be more of a formal ceremony, witnesses, and all that. Nevertheless, this seems to have fixed your ownership problem."

The territory-claiming imp was now barely pausing between stops, making soft whooping noises as she darted from place to place.

"It- it certainly did," Ami murmured, noting that the claimed territory was slowly starting to expand on its own, just as it had on the Avatar Islands back when she had gained the title of Empress. She met the Duke's eyes. "Th-Thank you. This can't have been easy for you. I'll make the most of this opportunity!" she promised.

A horde of imps appeared around them, filling the air with a green snowstorm of motes. They darted off in every direction, claiming terrain as they moved in long, straight lines to cover as much distance as possible.

Tiger chuckled as she watched the differently-coloured paths slowly grow wider on their own. "So this is how one accidentally conquers a city," she teased.

Ami winced. Right now, she neither wanted nor needed to think about how this would give everyone who didn't know the details the wrong impression.

Last edited: May 28, 2018

War Council

Within a small chamber, King Ral of Nimbadnur sat at an undecorated wooden table. Across from him stood one of the various rank-and-file wizards whose name he didn't bother remembering. The hooded mage had his hands on a brightly glowing crystal ball, which projected his shadow onto the script-like wards engraved into the walls.

Both wizard and king were showing identically incredulous expressions as their eyebrows crept towards their hairlines.

"She WHAT?" Ral broke the silence as he shouted at the crystal ball in front of him.

Within the transparent orb, the image of Duke Libasheshtan cringed. "My Liege, I know it sounds unlikely-"

"Unlikely? Try impossible!" he interrupted.

"I beg your pardon, but she was able to work the adamantine," the Duke repeated his preposterous claim. "I saw it myself. You are aware of what this means, naturally."

King Ral nodded gravely. "Yes. Yes indeed." He understood perfectly that there were several possibilities, some of which he could discard due to the gold-patterned marble pillars visible behind the Duke. Since he was inside a temple, he could be neither an imposter nor an illusion, and mind control or possession could be excluded too. "It means that you were completely taken in by her deceptions, Thol!"

The Duke flinched. "My Liege, I understand that this is a tempting interpretation, but there is proof! Simply scry on the adamantine box to observe its damaged wall," he suggested.

"The box hidden under ice? The box whose interior doesn't show any damage? That box?" With each question, his voice became more acidic.

Duke Libasheshtan seemed to shrink. "The hole is under the mace that's sticking to the wall," he explained.

"Which, surprise, means it can't be seen," he replied, crossing his arms.

"It exists! The wall is punctured! It has to be! She couldn't have escaped otherwise," Duke Libasheshtan insisted.

"Unless the trap never closed properly," he pointed out dryly as he managed to regain his calm. He shouldn't direct his anger at the confused Duke, but at the monster who had caused him all this trouble. Poor Thol looked as if he had aged years in the past few hours.

"But we were completely cut off from the outside," the Duke pointed out. "Even scrying didn't work on us!"

"What's more likely, a Keeper piercing adamantine or said Keeper finding a way to block scrying?" he asked. "One who has been temporarily unscryable in the past?"

The dwarf in the crystal ball grimaced. "But I could sense the seal hardening…"

"Thol, you have to face the facts. The Dark Empress and her illusions deceived you. I'm sure that if one of the priests were to check you for magical residues, he would find quite a number of them."

"From the potions I imbibed before our confrontation," the Duke protested stubbornly, shaking his head.

The King sighed. "Enough," he said. "I do not have the time to keep arguing with you. Try to shake off Mercury's influence and don't cause any more damage," he half-ordered, half-pleaded.

"But-"

The dwarven ruler leaned heavily on his cane as he rose from his seat and addressed the wizard, "Sever the connection. You may go rest; I won't require your services in the immediate future."

"Thank you, Sire." The mage let the light within the crystal ball fade with a relieved expression. He bowed deeply, and a few beads of sweat dripped from under his hood onto the floor.

Ral turned without a word and approached the chamber's exit. He parted the jingling curtain of wards that covered the door and pulled it open, and the noise of heated discussion assaulted his ears.

"-at the limit! If I had a way to recharge the flywheels faster I'd already be using it!" Duke Alnisalath, a rather large dwarf with a greying beard shouted down at the much shorter Duke Cattenor.

Seated just to Alnisalath's left, the slender dwarf leaned away from his neighbour, grimacing as flying spittle landed in his short-cropped hair.

"You are both morons!" the rotund Duchess Ducimezar shouted as she slammed both fists onto the table, causing their goblets to jump. "Why are you discussing logistics when she can just do to our army what she did to Salthalls?"

The white-haired Duchess Lalimush stared unhappily at the wine droplets that had landed on her map. Her wrinkly hand rose and made a rude gesture in the other Duchess' direction.

At the same time, a wad of paper flew over the empty chair reserved for Duke Libasheshtan and smacked Ducimezar right in the forehead.

Duke Omerreg gave her a flat look as she turned towards him with an outraged expression, his arm still raised from his throw. "Read the damn reports, will you? Countess Zasod did-" He stopped as he noticed the King returning to the meeting. "Your Majesty," he greeted, rising from his seat.

An instant later, the four other dukes followed his example. Lined up on the side of the table closest to the readied hero gate, they stood with their heads respectfully inclined.

King Ral's gaze swept over them, lingering for a moment on the gap where Duke Libasheshtan should have been. "At ease," he said, approaching his own throne at the head of the table.

Wooden chair legs scraped over the ground as the nobles seated themselves.

"My discussion with Thol was less than satisfying," he began, absently stroking his beard. "He is physically safe within a temple-"

A few of the expressions along the table brightened.

"- yet his mind remains thoroughly compromised by whatever the Dark Empress did to him," he continued, dashing the rising hopes. "Consider him lost to the enemy for the time being."

"For someone like him to break so quickly…" Duke Alnisalath said, shaking his head sadly.

The others looked uneasy, perhaps imagining such a thing happening to them.

"That said, have you made any progress while I was occupied?" Ral asked, not expecting much after the previous display. Marshalling troops faster in response to an unforeseen catastrophe was difficult when one had already been doing so at top speed before.

To his surprise, Duke Omerreg nodded and picked up one of the scrolls before him and shoved it in his direction. One of the advantages of using the hero gates to meet in person, rather than wasting limited scrying ball capacity on communication. "In fact, this is a report on one of the leads you had us investigate. The human Baron Leopold confirms that Keeper Mercury had the opportunity to interrogate him, though he remembers no such thing happening during his kidnapping."

With a loud bang, the King's fist struck the table, making wine spill from shaking goblets once more.

"She played me for a fool!" he exclaimed in sudden anger. "She knew! She knew all along!"

"S-Sire?" Duke Alnisalath asked, looking hopelessly confused.

The King gritted his teeth. "Baron Leopold acted as the bait in the trap that killed Keeper Bartholomeus," he hissed. "Mercury knew to expect an adamantine box and incorporated it into her plans!"

Unlike his frowning fellow nobles, Duke Uzolgim looked thoughtful. With a hesitantly optimistic tone, he said, "Sire, I believe this may be good news."

Ral focused on the haggard, black-bearded Duke in surprise. "How so?"

"Don't you think it explains a lot about how she managed to pull off her attack on Salthalls?"

He met the Duke's expectant gaze with a confused look. "You may have to elaborate a little. Not everyone here has studied at a magical academy."

Uzolgim paused, his hand absently starting to adjust the clasp of his purple cloak. "Ah, yes, pardon me. Normally, a magical ritual of the observed magnitude and duration would be impossible to conduct in enemy territory, due to being too vulnerable to interruption. However, if she was expecting the adamantine trap, then she could have arrived with the intent of keeping it from closing and using it as shelter – all while keeping us blind to what was really going on!"

"That makes a disturbing amount of sense," Duke Cattenor commented.

"It's the kind of convoluted and deceitful plot she is infamous for," Duchess Ducimezar agreed grudgingly.

King Ral groaned. "So she couldn't have done it without me." He sighed and turned to Duke Uzolgim with a nod of understanding. "The bright side, then, is that she cannot do it again."

The other nobles suddenly sat straighter, as if a great burden had been lifted from their shoulders.

Duke Alnisalath pushed aside the stack of papers with drafts for evacuation strategies. "Looks like we won't be needing those."

"Wait, can we be certain she can't do it without the adamantine box?" Duke Cattenor cautioned.

"Reasonably so," Duke Uzolgim replied. "She's still busing trying to establish control over her victims. That means she couldn't do it directly with her ritual, which indicates a lack of precision – likely the need to work through a tiny gap in an impenetrable barrier."

"Well, I'm convinced," Duke Omerreg said. "Doesn't really change that we need to reach and destroy her as soon as possible."

"I still say we should attack right now!" Duke Alnisalath suggested. "The forces besieging her dungeon could take her by surprise since she's busy elsewhere!"

"Nonsense, that's completely out of the question due to her ability to turn people into monsters," Duke Cattenor objected.

"We have countermeasures! Like most people here, I actually read my paperwork,"Alnisalath said as he glowered at Duchess Ducimezar.

King Ral had skimmed the report in question. Before fleeing through a hero gate, Countess Zasod had recovered some of the adamantine wards that had been used against the invader. They provided a bubble of safety against the contaminated water, repelling it. Unfortunately, the repulsion went both ways, which made crossing larger bodies of water rather impractical.

Duke Cattenor pinched the bridge of his nose in irritation. "We can't protect the prisoners in her dungeon. If she turns them into monsters, then our besieging forces will be hopelessly outnumbered."

"Which means we are stuck with the original plan of massing our forces and hitting her with everything. Except now we need to do so before she can receive reinforcements from Salthalls," Duke Uzolgim summarised the situation.

"The railway tunnels between Salthalls and Whitemountain have already been blocked?" King Ral verified.

Duke Omerreg nodded. "Blocked, trapped, and put under observation. She won't be using our own infrastructure against us."

"Good. What's the current worst-case scenario you came up with?" the King asked. "Her flying ships? Teleportation?"

"I have given the elves access to our hero gates," Duchess Ducimezar replied. "Their wizards should be able to deal with any flying transports."

"Right. And the teleportation?" King Ral looked at Duke Uzolgim.

"She doesn't have enough warlocks to teleport a strategically relevant amount of troops," the cloak-wearing Duke replied.

"I'm glad to hear that," Ral replied.

"Wait," Cattenor said, "what if she creates more dungeons between her current one and Salthalls and then transports her minions?"

Duke Uzolgim winced "That's- it would be risky and expensive, but it's not impossible," he admitted in a chagrined voice.

"Oh, our wizards will love to hear that there's something else to look out for," Duchese Ducimezar grumbled. "They are about ready to keel over from exhaustion."

King Ral made a quick decision. "Duke Uzolgim, adjust the scrying rotation appropriately to take that threat into account. We will have to rely on the intervening villages to spot any troops travelling from Salthalls to Whitemountain." Untrained peasant militiamen might not be up to assaulting a dungeon, but detecting enemy troops near their village was within their capabilities.

"It shall be done."

He considered the most aggressive of his Dukes. "Duke Alnisalath, your troops are close enough to Duke Libasheshtan's lands to arrive this evening. You will be the vanguard of our army and secure the most likely locations her troops would have to pass through. Our highest priority for now is preventing her from linking her forces!"

Ami, unable to leave Salthalls without losing her local territory, had claimed one of the palace's vacant offices as her temporary workroom. The missing owner was probably a noble, given the expensive wood paneling on the walls and the size and craftsmanship of the desk. If there was anything to complain about, it was the chair's thick padding. It was so comfortable she risked dozing off if she closed her eyes and took a break.

For the moment, however, she was fully alert and concentrating on her work. Despite the outcome of her ill-fated attempt to initialise negotiations– or perhaps because of it– the dwarfs still refused to listen to her or to her representatives.

She sighed and tried to convince herself that, technically, she hadn't made her situation worse. They had already been ignoring her diplomatic efforts and trying to kill her before. What she had really lost was time during which the dwarven army continued gathering and approaching. In return, she had gained a dwarven city of dubious usefulness and a whole lot of additional complications. Nevertheless, there were enough demi-youma within Salthalls to keep her dungeon heart safe, if she could arrange for appropriate transport.

Her palmtop computer was open in front of her, showing the schematics of the large tunnelling machine she was designing. Trains were her most practical option for transferring people and materials between the two locations, but she had decided not to co-opt the dwarven railways. Potential for sabotage and roadblocks aside, none of them connected all the way to her dungeon. If she already had to create the equipment for building part of the tracks, then she might as well use it to construct a new, direct line to Salthalls.

It should be possible before the bulk of the enemy forces arrived. With a large drill coated in imp pick metal and a treasury-derived power source like the one used by her reaperbots, she was expecting her machine to dig through the underground at least at walking speeds. The distance between her dungeon and Salthalls was about 250 kilometres in a straight line, so about fifty hours of digging. If she used two machines and dug from both directions, they would meet in the middle in a little more than a day. Enough time for her to design a room blueprint for laying tracks, as well as the trains themselves. In addition, Jadeite was testing a few ideas for helping out with his glamour.

Best of all, she could potentially get away with this before the dwarfs noticed, as long as all the work happened in complete darkness to protect it from scrying. She should provide a distraction, too. Sabotaging their railways to slow down their approach would work, and perhaps she could use her airships to-

"My Empress? Pardon the interruption, but I have run out of test subjects," a mental message from Monteraine derailed her train of thought.

That, at least, was a problem she could solve quickly. She shifted her Keeper sight to a tiny hatchery back at her dungeon. Hens and yellow-feathered chicks scrabbled in the dirt of the square pit, their heads bobbing up and down as they gobbled up the unearthed worms and maggots.

Mentally apologizing to the unsuspecting birds, she forced a spell into the pit's wards crushing it into chaotic mana, and then added a trickle of Metallia's power to the mix.

Replicating the calamity that had befallen Salthalls on a small, controlled scale wasn't difficult, but she disliked the need for animal experimentation. The dense, black fog streaked with rainbow colours spread through the tiny hatchery, and the contented clucking turned into disturbing pops and screeches.

She zoomed her Keeper sight in on the empty cages lined up on Monteraine's lab table. One by one, she transported the mutated chickens into the metal containers.

Immediately, the vaguely bird-shaped monstrosities started throwing themselves against the bars.

The clattering alerted the black-haired sorceress, who glanced over. A pleased smile appeared on her face. "Thank you, your Majesty," she said, addressing the air above the cages. "Would you like a progress report?"

"Yes, please," Ami replied. A single glance at Monteraine told her why the chickens were trying to escape.

The older woman was wearing an apron covered in blood over her barely-there dress and holding a crimson-stained cleaver. From her other hand dangled a dead mutant chicken, held by one of its four legs. Its left wing was smaller than its right, and stitches surrounded it, clearly visible through the plucked gap in the corpse's plumage.

Without looking, the sorceress carelessly tossed the dead chicken towards a large waste bin, where the salivating goblin inside caught it.

"Very well. So far, replacing mutated body parts with healthy organs has been a complete success," she said, "in as far as there were zero incidences of the transplants becoming contaminated. Long-term survival rates are still unknown, though they don't look good for the current batch of test subjects. I didn't check for compatibility in order to get faster results. "

That didn't bode well for the unconscious birds in the cages stacked against the wall. Ami regretfully made a note to have their suffering ended quickly. Perhaps their original purpose of ending up as some creature's meal would have been a kinder fate. "That's… that's valuable knowledge, but we have neither enough surgeons nor spare body parts for this to be an applicable solution," she informed Monteraine.

The sorceress shrugged. "Regeneration could solve that problem." She paused. "And provide some surgery practice too," she added, sounding thoughtful.

That conjured up a whole lot of disturbing scenarios. "Youma do slowly regenerate on their own when provided with enough magic," she pointed out. "They wouldn't need transplants."

Monteraine shook her head. "Of course, your Majesty, but the amputated parts grew back wrong for about half of my regenerating test subjects." Her expression turned contemplative. "My current theory is that the cuts were simply in the wrong place, passing through subtly contaminated tissue. In that case, just trying again in other spots once the subject has sufficiently recovered might work." She made a few enthusiastic chopping motions with her cleaver.

Ami paled and was suddenly glad that Monteraine wasn't anywhere near any unfortunate dwarfs. "I would prefer a less invasive solution. Depending on the location of the infected body parts, removing them would be fatal."

"A fair point," the sorceress agreed. "I admit I'm curious about whether or not I'm having more success with this than the Light priests."

"Well, they don't seem to have any trouble curing the corruption-induced insanity," she replied. "Unfortunately, my sister's idea doesn't seem to work as well as I had hoped. The basic idea of the youma's shape being influenced by its self-image is valid, as far as I can tell with animals."

At least, the fully youmafied chickens she had delivered to the dwarven temple had turned into proud, formidable-looking birds, which she considered a good sign. Of course, an issue remained that complicated her evaluation.

"However, mutated youma flesh – as opposed to healthy, normal youma flesh – stays mutated even when the youma's shape changes. Fortunately, their bodies are adaptable and can work around the mutations so this doesn't kill them." She paused. "For as long as they don't get turned back to normal."

"They can already turn them back to normal?" Monteraine blurted out, sounding almost offended.

"Yes, the dwarven priests have a ritual that exorcises dark magic, which returns the youmafied parts to their original state," Ami elaborated. "It's somewhat similar to one of Jadeite's Glamour spells running out of power." However, she wasn't as elated as she should have been about that discovery. Her stomach lurched as she remembered the outcomes so far. "But it only works on the youmafied parts. Healthy flesh and mutated bits – they don't get moved into proper alignment or changed to fit, and, well, the result is rather messy."

Monteraine nodded along, mollified. "How intriguing! Could I – no, wait, the goal is having more troops." For a moment, she looked disappointed before her expression turned confident. "Actually, I believe one of the possibilities I'm looking into could be an expedient solution for this problem." With a few deft steps, she walked over to an alcove and pulled aside the curtain separating it from the rest of the lab.

Its green-skinned occupant started and looked up from the necromantic tome resting on the pedestal in front of her. Landra brushed a strand of cyan hair out of her face as her button-like purple eyes focused on Monteraine.

"Continue with your studies," the sorceress told her.

The youma looked puzzled, but nodded and resumed reading.

Ami was a little surprised to find Landra here, but after a moment of thought and a quick look at the page, she approved of her learning some healing spells. Landra currently didn't have any special abilities of her own, unless being attractive by human standards counted. Upon closer inspection however, she spotted something horribly wrong with the elf-looking woman's left earlobe.

A small, bumpy tendril the size of a caterpillar dangled from the bottom of the large, triangular ear like a wriggling earring.

"Monteraine, what's that mutation? Are you experimenting on her?" Some anger was seeping into Ami's voice. "You were explicitly forbidden from harming anyone!"

Monteraine stiffened. "G-general Jadeite volunteered her since she's not good for much else! Besides," her tone steadied, "there's no harm done. It's an earlobe. Completely irrelevant to her overall health. People get them pierced for cosmetic reasons all the time." She waved the hand holding her cleaver dismissively, causing Landra to flinch as a droplet of blood flew towards her.

Ami breathed in deeply, trying to remain calm. The explanation made some twisted sense, even if it was against the spirit of her orders. The harm done was certainly insignificant when compared to her current problems, so she could overlook it for the moment. "For future reference, you are not to perform any experiments on non-animal test subjects. Now, what did you want to show me?"

Monteraine bowed her head. "Of course, my Empress. At first, I was planning to see if a youma could exert enough conscious control over her body to move the mutation."

Landra nervously eyed the cleaver as Monteraine waved it back and forth between her earlobe and the tip of the ear.

"But then, I noticed something interesting. Regular test subjects are just a confusing mishmash of various degrees of mutation and youmafication all blending into each other. I couldn't even begin to guess what their healthy state would look like, let alone try to heal them. However, with a full youma, it's actually pretty simple to tell what's wrong. The remaining mutations stand out similar to wounds or foreign tissue. This should make them susceptible to treatment with regular healing spells."

Ami perked up. If she turned the victims into full youma and had them healed of their mutations, then the priests should be able to turn them back to normal without complications. *"How long would it take for a competent healer to remove someone's mutations?" s*he asked, considering the logistics.

Monteraine shrugged. "It completely depends on their extent, complexity, and location. Could be a few hours for mild cases, but most would probably take a week or more."

"Oh." Ami slumped in her seat, disappointed. Even if she assumed that all of the dwarven priests had been safe in their temples and were willing and able to help with the healing, there were around thirty thousand patients to treat. It would take years to cure everybody.

"Is that too slow? We could always just chop the mutated bits off." Monteraine pointed with her cleaver at Landra again.

The youma backed away and covered her ear protectively. "What? No cutting!"

"Oh, don't be such a cry-baby! You can grow it back! There's nothing to complain about!"

"It would still hurt!" Landra shot back, glowering at the dark sorceress.

"That falls under not being allowed to harm anyone, Monteraine! No amputations!" Ami reprimanded her, disturbed by her enthusiasm.

The sorceress seemed to shrink as her shoulders slumped. "As you wish. In that case, I have a question that may be relevant."

"Yes?"

"When you transform a test subject into a youma, can you aim towards a desired outcome?"

Ami paused. Could she influence the resulting youma's form? So far, she had simply been flooding the mutated chickens with Metallia's power until they turned into full youma. "The possibility hadn't occurred to me yet," she answered even as she decided to ask for Jadeite's advice on the subject. "Why?"

Monteraine smiled. "Oh, I have an idea that could work…"

Last edited: Aug 3, 2018

Extended Mining Operations

Someone was insistently knocking on the temple's door hard enough to rattle its stained glass window, and showed no intention of stopping.

Gnashing his teeth at the thought of the centuries-old artwork taking damage, Brother Momuz rushed over, unlocked the door, and yanked it open. He breathed in deeply, ready to unleash a tirade about respecting priceless masterworks on the offender.

A bright light shone right into his eyes, forcing him to squint at the grossly obese visitor who was wearing a yellow helmet with a lamp in its centre. No, wait, it was actually just an imp standing behind a large metal pot.

The only reason he didn't slam the door in its ugly face was that it probably would resume knocking.

"Oh. Another delivery?" Sister Tosid's voice came from behind him.

With a metallic screech, the pot slid forwards as the imp kicked it over the threshold.

Momuz barely managed to pull his sandaled feet away before the heavy cooking utensil could slam into his toes.

The pot came to a rest but continued shaking on its own.

He glowered at it, and then at the imp, deeply unhappy with the situation. "Is that another chicken? Why is it in a pot? The previous ones were in wicker baskets!"

The imp tilted her head aside and stared at him with her large, pitch black eyes. A moment later, she fished a large scroll from her backpack. Baring her teeth in a mischievous smile, she ignored his extended hand and threw it at his face.

He made a startled noise as the roll of paper bounced off his head.

Before he could complain, the imp was already running off.

Snickering, she crossed the bridge leading over the decorative pond outside and hopped over the line of colourful discharges where holy ground held off the expansion of the dungeon beyond.

"Brother Momuz, are you all right?" Sister Tosid asked from close behind him, sounding worried.

He let the angry scowl fade from his face. "Yes, yes, I'm simply annoyed by that vile little creature." He opened the scroll and added in a resigned voice, "Let's see what this says."

At least the handwriting was neat and easily readable. Nevertheless, he paled and swallowed. "It's from the Dark Empress herself. Says she personally modified the chicken in that pot."

Sister Tosid nervously tugged on her sleeves and lowered her voice, "Is- is it really acceptable to do this? It feels…"

"Treasonous?" he completed her sentence with a dark look. "We do have orders from the Duke himself to find a cure using all available resources."

She looked at the ground. "Yes, I know, but it kind of feels like skirting the edges of the law," she admitted.

"We will simply have to trust in his judgement and in the Light. He was here in the temple, so he shouldn't be under outside influences," he replied. However, he secretly mirrored her concerns. There was no denying the fact that some degree of collusion with the Dark Empress was happening.

For the sake of the victims disfigured by Mercury's magic, he could temporarily set aside his concerns about the lawfulness of a investigating a potential cure. Helping them would be worth it, even if relying on a Keeper's aid made him feel as if he needed to scrub himself clean. Besides, he didn't actually dare to refuse her requests, especially since he'd soon have to worry about food…

They carried the pot past the pews and close to the large altar that vaguely resembled a huge anvil covered in gems and gold-filled engravings. It was the safest spot for experiments, as evil magic would be greatly weakened in its presence.

He placed the pot down within the tiny pen made from overturned pews that they had used for previous chicken experiments, and shook his head when Sister Tosid reached for the lid. "The note says to read all of the instructions before beginning, so let's see. Huh."

He waved her closer as he quietly read the key points out loud. "Only cure insanity when subject is fully healed… it has redundant organs… it regenerates lost mass…" His eyebrows shot upwards as he reread the words before him. "The thing is liquid?"

The female priest blinked and looked into the pen. "Wait, that's a pot of chicken soup?"

The container rocked and shook, making clanging noises.

"Very angry chicken soup," she amended.

He finished reading the note and put his hands on the lid. "Aside from the delayed insanity cure, we can use almost the same procedure as before. The only weird thing is that we are supposed to chase the creature around a bit until it has left behind all of its solid parts."

"That sounds simple enough," Sister Tosid said, though the dubious look she was giving the limited room within the pen somewhat contradicted her statement.

"Well, no choice but to give it a try." He unscrewed the lid with a deft motion.

At the pot's bottom rested a reddish, transparent liquid with irregular chunks and veins suspended within. It went unnaturally still the moment light fell on it. An instant later, it contracted into a ball shape and launched itself upwards.

He yanked his head backwards, too slow to avoid the gross, slimy liquid splashing all over his face.

"Ah, I suppose straining the chunks out with your beard works too?" Sister Tosid commented with a nervous laugh.

Momuz clawed at his beard ineffectually as his fingers simply passed through the liquid. "Less terrible jokes, more help!"

"Right! By the Light, sleep peacefully!" she intoned, and a tendril of blue light snaked through the air, connecting her index finger with the slime on his face.

The thing went limp and stretched out into a long, sticky thread as it flopped unto the floor. Somehow, it stayed in one piece even as it splashed into a shape that reminded him of a splatter of vomit.

He grimaced, all too aware of the wobbly chunks left behind in his beard. The sensation made him shudder in disgust. The weight of the fleshy tumours and root-like tendrils lessened as part of the dirt disintegrated into dust. Unfortunately, some blood and bits of offal remained behind. "Urk, the smell!" he complained, feeling bile rise in his throat.

The slime on the ground undulated slowly, presumably still asleep.

While Momuz was wringing out his beard, Sister Tosid had procured a mop and started shoving around the viscuous ooze. The liquid held together well, leaving no droplets behind. However, the solid bits and pieces that swam within gradually stuck to the floor and came loose.

"Do you think the solid stuff is mutated tissue that didn't transform properly?" she asked, watching the deteriorating remains.

"That would make sense," Momuz agreed as he used his sleeve like a washcloth. He frowned at the mostly inert slime on the ground. "I'm more concerned about that thing's pustules though. Ugh."

Ugly boils and bumps were growing on the ooze's surface, giving it a diseased and plagued look.

Sister Tosid instinctively edged away even though there was no realistic chance of contagion, given the altar's proximity. "It might be growing back lost mass?" she guessed after a moment.

"Regenerating on its surface, rather than where it was hurt?" Momuz asked, dubious.

She shrugged. "Well, it's a liquid. I don't see any wounds, so it probably doesn't care where it lost stuff."

He paused as he considered the idea, and then threw up his hands in disgust. "Bah, I don't even want to consider how much magic is necessary for that thing to stay alive."

The slime in question eventually stopped looking sickly as its surface smoothed out.

Sister Tosid used her mop to slosh the monster around some more, but there weren't any more pieces coming off.

"I think it's ready," Momuz said. "Do you want to do the honours?"

"After you," Sister Tosid declined. "I'm still un-slimed and would like to remain that way," she added, sounding slightly smug.

He looked down at his stained vestments and hands, grumbled, but accepted her logic. He squatted down, hands glowing as he muttered a diagnosis spell and poked the oozy puddle.

The liquid felt surprisingly warm, and apparently suffered from extreme exhaustion. Its anatomy was utterly incomprehensible but alive.

He could feel the mostly water-flavoured magic holding it together. There was also an uncomfortably large helping of evil, ice, and corruption mixed in.

Shuddering in revulsion, he watched his healing magic stir up the insides of the being, moving liquefied parts to different locations for reasons he couldn't discern. "It's done," he announced when he sensed that there was nothing more for him to do.

"Well, time to restore its sanity, then," Sister Tosid said as she proceeded to sweep the slime into a bucket. Carefully, she raised the container up onto the altar and inclined it until a tendril of liquid dribbled down onto the consecrated surface.

The bucket in her hand shook as the tendril whipped back into the main mass and the slime woke. With a loud slurping sound, the ooze rose and sculpted itself into the shape of a chicken. The transparent, red-tinted bird peered over the buckets edge curiously, wobbling with each jerky move of its head.

Both priests looked at each other and joined hands, ready to exorcise the evil magic afflicting the creature.

Oily black streaks shot out of the bird and burnt with a bright flash. With bulging eyes, the chicken wobbled and stretched, and then it fell over.

"Did it work?" Sister Tosid asked as she stared down at the feathery, normal looking bird in the bucket.

Momuz reached down and grabbed the hen, who feebly batted her wings. The light of a diagnosis spell seeped from in between his fingers. "It feels healthy enough," he concluded in a disbelieving tone. "There's a few remaining issues, but nothing life threatening. Some more healing spells and she'll be fine."

There was a delighted squeal from Sister Tosid. "It's a working cure? Oh, oh, I can handle the rest, I'm not feeling as drained as usual!"

"Maybe that's because it was already in the right shape?" he speculated, also feeling elated by their success.

However, Sister Tosid suddenly froze and paled dramatically. "W-wait, one of us will have to meet with the Dark Empress to report this, correct?"

The echoing boom of an explosion shook the underground. Moments later, a thin jet of water burst from the curved rock ceiling, ripping loose a chip of stone. It bounced off the boring machine below with a metallic ping, barely audible over the noise of the drill. Rock groaned, and water gushed everywhere as the cracks widened. Within moments, larger stones rained down on the train-sized machine, their impacts hard enough to knock it out of alignment. Water was already pooling around its wheels when the ceiling caved in completely, crushing the engine under rock and flooding the tunnel.

Ami's view of the ruined machine was lost as her last imp teleported out of the area. Instead, she saw the narrow corridor she had been walking through for the last twelve hours. It ended only a few steps ahead of her, but an imp was digging through the rock at the same pace she was advancing. A second worker was claiming the newly excavated space, producing brief flashes of aquamarine light that revealed two more imps fortifying the walls.

"My apologies, your Majesty," Torian's voice intruded into Ami's thoughts. In her Keeper sight, he was glowering at a crystal ball that showed mud-covered dwarven soldiers high-fiving each other near a small village. "We were expecting their attack closer to the stream up ahead. There was an unpredicted aquifer, and with us not knowing the positions of their hero gates-"

"Don't worry about it," she interrupted. "Successfully defending a tunnel outside of my dungeon's area of influence was unlikely to begin with," she assured him.

Which explained why she was down here in a tiny dark corridor so deep underground that sweat turned into steam from the ambient heat. Her imps could claim territory up to sixty kilometres out from her dungeon heart or from herself. Thus, by travelling said distance from Salthalls towards Highroot Mountain, she almost doubled the length of the tunnel section that was part of her dungeon territory while still maintaining her claim on the city.

The dwarfs knew that she was moving, of course. She had detected multiple attempts to scry on her so far, but she didn't think her opponents would attack her directly. Why commit forces merely to chase her away when it was harder than assaulting her new railway tunnels?

Case in point, they had gone for the tunnelling machine currently outside the borders of her territory. It implied that they understood Keeper distance limitations and could somehow detect her – admittedly noisy - digging operations.

Without Keeper transport, her ability to deploy defenders was limited to having youma teleport them in, especially if she wanted to avoid damaging the tunnel. A few ice golems couldn't really do much against a more numerous enemy willing to bypass them in order to damage her equipment first.

She hoped the dwarfs were satisfied with their easy victory. After all, she didn't want them to keep looking and finding the second boring machine digging a tunnel at a greater depth than the first. The noise of the collapsed tunnel above flooding should mask the sounds of its drill. If the dwarfs found it anyway – well, they would be surprised when they encountered its defences.

The ice golem body she possessed kept moving on its own, carefully putting one foot in front of the other and brushing its left hand against the wall in order to maintain uninterrupted contact with her claimed territory. This allowed her to focus her attention on working remotely.

She looked up a map, taking note of her current location and updating the positions of her boring machines. "Jadeite?" she contacted the dark general mentally. "You can drop the glamours; one of my tunnels has been spotted."

"Understood. We are proceeding to the critical phase, then?"

"Yes. Please make sure the civilians stay calm, this will be an unfamiliar experience for them," she told him.

At the top of Highroot Mountain, the airships anchored to the looming citadel fell out of the rainy sky one after the other. Their huge, elongated silhouettes came apart from the top, canvas flaking away as if it was burning up. The metal ribs underneath shattered as the vessels started to fall, breaking up into smaller and smaller pieces. Remnants of the gondolas disappeared last, leaving only the anchor chains to plummet into the depths.

Baron Sodnil grinned widely has he lowered his telescope. "Impressive work!" he complimented as he gave the slender man standing next to him a pat on the back that made him stagger. "Much faster than last time!"

The tanned, shivering and pointy-eared elf caught his balance and turned to face him with a puzzled expression. "But, but we didn't do anything?" he said, sniffling as he pulled his fur coat tighter around himself.

"What?" Baron Sodnil furrowed his brow and stared back up at the tower of black stone that remained bereft of its airship fleet. He turned back to the elf, but the bunker's door flew open at that moment.

A scout burst into the room and shouted, "Illusions, my Lord! They were illusions!"

The Baron whirled to face the panting dwarf clad in a rain-drenched hooded leather cloak. "Illusions? The flying ships weren't real?" he asked even as his hackles rose. Had the enemy not only managed to dig a tunnel, but also to smuggle out troops right under his nose?

The scout stared at him with his mouth open, a small puddle of rainwater forming around his feet in the sudden silence. "I don't know anything about no ships, my Lord," he said after a moment. "I'm talking about the monsters!"

"What? Explain!" Baron Sodnil disliked not knowing what was going on. He had the sinking feeling that he would dislike finding out even more.

"The enemy troops! They just disappeared along with the dungeon's fog! There's nobody down there!"

"That doesn't make any sense! They must be hiding, because…" He stopped as he caught movement in the distance from the corner of his eye and whirled to face the window.

The stone tower on the mountaintop was melting away like wax in a blacksmith's forge. Occasionally, something sparkled like gold in the runny mass that was evaporating into nothingness.

Baron Sodnil paled as he put the pieces of the puzzle together. As expected, his horrifying conclusion didn't make him any happier. He grabbed the elven wizard by the arm and rushed towards the door. "RUN! RETREAT! ALL TROOPS, GET OUT OF HERE NOW! Away from the mountain!" he shouted at the top of his lungs.

He hoped he was wrong. In that case, abandoning his position here was likely a career-ending mistake. If he was right, however, then the Dark Empress had just emptied out her dungeon and left herself defenceless. Which meant she was about to blow them all up with some kind of huge, indiscriminate attack before they could take advantage. Dungeon hearts couldn't move, after all.

A vehicle resembling a cylindrical tank cart slowly advanced through the new railway tunnel. It was far larger than a regular train cart, big enough that it needed to use both of the parallel tracks, and its many wheels groaned under the weight of its armour.

Flexible rubber tentacles as wide as a man's torso protruded from the sides of the self-propelled machine, giving it a caterpillar-like appearance. Some stuck to the walls, elongating as the vehicle advanced, while others remained loose.

Whenever one of the taut tendrils was stretched close to the snapping point, one of the escorting imps ran down its length and dug its pick into the block of ice that kept it attached to the wall. At the same time, other imps would rush ahead of the machine carrying one of the loose tentacles and press it against the tunnel's surface. One freezing spell later, the formerly loose appendage was firmly connected to the masonry, and the imp performed a claiming dance on the ice block.

King Ral let out a long sigh, his breath streaming over the cold surface of the crystal ball and causing it to fog over. "So," he said, turning towards his assembled Dukes. "That dungeon heart is moving while still maintaining a connection to its territory. As far as we can tell, all of Keeper Mercury's assets from Whitemountain are currently within the unfinished tunnel. Suggestions?"

Duke Alnisalath shuffled awkwardly. "They are only moving at a brisk walking pace. I've managed to get troops in position, but they can't get in. She fortifies the tunnel walls with steel wherever someone tries to break in."

Duke Omerreg shuffled his papers, nodding his head. "Oh. Yes. Naturally, she can afford to do so after plundering Salthall's treasures. What a disaster."

"Is there any chance we can amass enough troops in time to successfully intercept her?" the king asked.

"Effectively impossible as of roughly an hour ago," Duke Uzolgim stated drily. He raised his hand to pre-empt Duchess Lalimush when she looked as if she was about to contradict him. "I can state this confidently without even considering our own logistics. The area of influence extending from her own body and that from her dungeon heart will be touching before we can get in position. At that point, she can reinforce any breach with troops from Salthalls."

King Ral seemed to shrink as he let himself drop onto his throne. "Damn it all. What are we supposed to do now?"

Last edited: Sep 29, 2018

A New Home

The underground train station resembled a widened tunnel section, its greater diameter offering enough room for four parallel tracks under the curved ceiling. Two of them, both occupied by one stationary train each, were dead ends. On the other two, the short, armoured wagon that carried the dungeon heart rumbled past. It slowly descended into a tunnel that led deeper underneath Salthalls. From the ceiling descended a steel gate as thick as a man's torso and sealed the passage, muffling the sound of the thunderous heartbeats that emanated from the wagon.

Meanwhile, the occupants of the other trains continued disembarking and moving towards a much larger, rectangular hall that merged with the enlarged tunnel at a right angle.

An open hatch as wide as a barn door revealed a crouching dragon squeezed into a compartment. Its large, scaly head emerged from wagon onto the crowded platform, prompting a few startled cries from orcs and goblins who had to jump aside. The head on top of a sinuous neck swung left and right like a pendulum as the dragon gawked at his surroundings, jostling some of the passers-by.

A goblin, pushed over by the impact, started to complain before she squeaked in fright and rolled aside. A clawed foot stepped down close to where she had been, and the entire wagon started tilting sideways as the dragon shifted his weight. About halfway emerged onto the platform, he suddenly froze as his eyes were drawn to the brightly lit balcony set high in the reception area's back wall.

Ami was watching her disembarking underlings from a throne framed by attention-grabbing blue banners that cascaded down the wall. She heard the indistinct muttering from below become louder and more irritated when the dragon stopped. Her troops didn't appreciate being cooped up in a train for hour and hours, and they didn't hesitate to loudly voice their frustration when somebody blocked the way.

"Mercury! Jered!" Cathy's voice distracted her. The blonde swordswoman emerged from a door in the back that led to the staircase. Winded from the long climb, she was breathing heavily, but that didn't slow her down at all when she threw herself into the arms of the brown-haired man standing close to Mercury's throne.

"Glad to see you too," he replied as he returned the hug.

Cathy let go after a moment and turned towards Ami, her smile giving way to a raised eyebrow. "I'm surprised you are here already. I thought you would be arriving once your dungeon heart was settled in."

"Oh, I had it stop for a moment when it was close enough to the city to maintain my territory in order to transport myself," Ami explained. "That's why the trains slowed down for a short time."

"Ah, I must have slept through that," Cathy replied.

"Lucky you," Jered sighed. The wavy bangs hanging into his face couldn't hide the dark circles under his eyes. "I can't believe I'm now wishing that I had travelled trapped in a small box filled with horrible monsters instead of one full of children." He raised his arm, swung it slowly in Ami's direction, and pointed a finger at her. "It's your fault my life stopped making sense!" he whined teasingly.

Ami shrunk back a little and blinked at him. "I, um, I suppose children can get a little excitable when they are bored?"

"Or when the walls suddenly start rushing past at insane speeds," he commented.

He was referring to the second half of the trip, when the slow tunnelling machines had met up and moved out of the way. At that point, her trains had finally been able to move at full speed down the finished tunnel, becoming too fast for the dwarfs to threaten them.

"Once the kids stopped being terrified, they became curious. So did their parents," Jered continued, shaking his head with a pained expression. "So many, many, many questions."

Behind him, Cathy put a hand over her mouth as she tried not to laugh. "Speaking of questions, Mercury, is there a particular reason why you are personally supervising your troops' arrival?" she asked, her tone becoming more business-like.

"Yes. I want to make sure that they are really paying attention when I lay down some ground rules," Ami replied. She was particularly worried about the goblins and their short attention spans.

There was a loud clanging noise as a reaperbot walked into the railing of one of the bridges leading across the tracks. Case in point.

Cathy nodded approvingly. "It's certainly going to make more of an impression coming from you than from me." She paused. "Do you want the vampire bats out of their crate for this?"

Ami hesitated. "I actually have no idea how they will interact with the aquifer above. Best to keep them as bats until we figure it out," she decided.

"I see. I'll have to adjust the guard shifts and rotations accordingly." Cathy reached into her backpack and pulled out a few sheets of papers with rows and columns covered in her handwriting. She held them out to Ami. "Here, let me know if there's anything else you want changed."

Ami read through the detailed schedules and occasionally made suggestions, usually where the allocation of warlocks to scrying and research tasks was concerned. It took long enough that the trains had emptied and its occupants assembled below the balcony when she was done.

She handed the papers back to Cathy, took a deep breath, and stood. Hoping she could convince her troops to behave, she approached the railing with an expression she had copied from one of her stricter teachers.

On the ground floor, the crowd had split into several groups that were idly chatting among themselves, separated mostly by species. The orcs with their pink skins and bright white manes stood out almost as much as the four towering dragons. Green was the predominant colour, as goblins, followed by trolls, were her most numerous minions. The tentacle monsters were looking a little ill too, adding even more green tones than usual to the sea of bodies. Colourful warlock robes contrasted sharply with everything else, making them the most distinguishable of the human and near-human employees. Recognizing at a distance whether a slender figure dressed in leather was a dark mistress or a dark elf proved much harder.

The chattering died down when Ami approached the railing, and she tried not to let her unease show as hundreds of eyes focused on her. "Everyone, welcome to Salthalls," she greeted, her voice boosted by a simple spell. "Food, drink, and comfortable beds are waiting for you, so I'll keep this short."

The crowd produced a few cheers and a mutter of general approval.

"First, there will be no looting and pillaging," she declared.

The hundreds of faces staring up at her lost their cheerful expressions, and the excited atmosphere gave way to a disappointed silence.

"That's bullshit!" someone protested in a gravelly voice.

Ami had been expecting some opposition and turned her head to stare directly at the orc who had spoken up. "Is that so?" she asked. He wasn't hard to pick out of the masses. Those with more developed survival instincts had immediately stepped away from him upon hearing his shout.

His eyes widened in surprise as he suddenly found himself isolated, surrounded by a ring of unsympathetic faces and expectant grins. His head darted left and right like that of a trapped animal looking for an escape route before he dropped to his knees. "I didn't mean to-"

"Strange," Ami interrupted him, her voice drowning out his own. "I don't remember seeing you here while I conquered this city."

The orc whimpered as she kept staring at him for several seconds.

Finally, she moved her gaze away from him and swept it over the crowd, trying to make eye contact with as many of her underlings as possible. "I'll keep this very simple. I," she pointed her thumb at her chest with a wide gesture, "conquered the city. I claimed it. It is mine."

This time, there were no protests from the crowd. Some were nodding nervously.

"You don't get to steal my things," she continued. "You don't get to destroy my things." She made sure to keep frowning while she swept her gaze over her listeners once more, waiting for her words to sink in. "Thus, no plundering and no pillaging. You will, however, be paid a victory bonus!"

A few goblins jumped and thrusted their fists in the air while shouts of approval echoed through the room. The warlocks reacted to her announcement with polite clapping, as well as a stray jet of fireworks from a staff.

Ami pretended she didn't notice the orc she had singled out slink away during the commotion. She raised her hands and made a shushing gesture. "Next point," she shouted, and the noises died down. "There are still temples of the Light active in the city."

A few bloodthirsty shouts came from below. One troll bounced his hammer against the ground rhythmically, producing a metallic drumming noise, and a few goblins chanted, "Burn! Burn! Burn!"

"You will leave them alone," Ami ordered loudly. "Ignore them. They are useful to me."

Confused looks and gaping mouths revealed misshapen teeth Ami would have preferred not seeing. A moment later, the monsters started exchanging looks to see what the others thought of that revelation.

Before the grumbling could start, she stretched her lips into a wide grin, trusting more in the lighting to hide its fake nature than in her acting skills. "For now." She added in a flat tone, as if it was the punchline to a joke.

A ripple of understanding went through the crowd, and the tension dissipated as creatures chuckled.

"Finally, the other inhabitants of the city," she said, relieved about clearing another hurdle. "If you spot strange creatures you don't recognise, then avoid them. Most are insane, and many have strange powers you can't handle. They are bound to my dungeon heart, so just leave them be. They are not your problem."

Her underlings shrugged or nodded, but aside from a few intrigued looking warlocks, they seemed to accept her words.

"Told you that phrasing would work," Jered whispered. "Imply that youma-wrangling is dangerous extra work, and your minions will lose all interest."

Ami internally agreed with his assessment, but didn't visibly react because she was still addressing her audience. "Likewise, if you see dwarfs, don't attack them. They, too, are mine. In fact, don't attack anything that doesn't attack you first. That will keep you out of trouble."

A few of her employees looked a little apprehensive but didn't voice their objections.

"If that makes you uneasy, just remember that anyone who isn't supposed to be here has to first get past thousands of mutated dwarfs to reach you," she dismissed their concerns. "That's all I wanted to tell you. Now go to your new quarters, celebrate and rest!" She swung her arm to the side, and the large portcullis blocking the exit swung open. "Just follow the very obvious signposts!"

"Oh, you learned from a certain general who was unwilling to ask for directions?" Jered commented with a grin.

"Wait, Jadeite got lost guiding the civilians to their quarters?" Cathy asked.

The dark general had arrived with the rescued villagers at Salthalls a few hours ago. Their trains could move faster than the slow, armoured dungeon heart transporter, and sending them ahead of the troops had simplified the disembarking process.

"You were with him, Jered," Ami sighed as she walked back to her throne and let herself drop onto it. She closed her eyes and massaged her forehead. To be fair, she found it hard to navigate the maze-like tunnels and alleys too, and she had a complete map of the place in her head. "I'd have sent an imp to guide you earlier if you had just contacted me."

"Well, excuse me for being busy keeping people from wandering off and for expecting him to actually know what he was doing. Besides, the civilians seemed to enjoy the sightseeing tour," he replied with a shrug. "Dwarven architecture is quite something."

Ami nodded with a weak smile. "It certainly is. I'm hoping to have a closer look myself once I have a little free time."

"Say, when was the last time you had a rest?" Cathy asked with a concerned expression. "You look as if you are having trouble keeping your eyes open."

Ami straightened. "I'm awake. Just dealing with placing the dungeon heart as we talk," she explained.

"That doesn't really answer my question," the swordswoman noted as she put her arms akimbo.

"Well, it was…" Ami trailed off. When had she last slept? Not today, not yesterday. The day before, perhaps? That seemed wrong, too. "I'm fairly sure it hasn't been longer than a week yet," she admitted after a moment.

"Right. Go to bed," Cathy told her. "If there was an urgent crisis right now, you wouldn't have given the troops some time off."

"The dwarfs-"

"Won't be catching up with us for at least a day or two," the blonde interrupted. "More than a week at least until they can bring a force large enough to pose a credible threat."

"Besides, I don't think they will bother us down here," Jered commented, shaking his head. "Strategically, it's not worth the risk. The city is already lost, its main export is rock salt, and there's no Underworld portal around. Mercury won't be getting any stronger if they let her keep it. On the other hand, an assault would have at best even odds to retake a dead city in exchange for losing most of their military."

"I think so too," Ami agreed easily. Assuming – as her opponents would - that she used the youmafied citizens as defenders, she would have close to forty thousand soldiers. Nimbadnur could field less than three times that, which would make assaulting a fortified dungeon a costly and desperate proposition. They'd also have to worry about her just turning the invaders into more mutants.

Jered scratched his head. "Then what's there to be concerned about? Assassins sneaking in?"

"Famine," Ami replied. "This city is a major population centre, but the vast majority of the dwarfs live in the countryside. The closest villages have already been abandoned, and more people will flee when the news that Salthalls has fallen spreads. I doubt the surrounding Duchies have enough food reserves to handle a massive wave of refugees."

Cathy and Jered fell quiet for a moment, shifting uneasily.

"That's- that's an unpleasant thought," the swordswoman said after a moment, crossing her arms. "But can you really do something about it?"

"At the risk of sounding callous, it's not your job to deal with it," Jered pointed out. "In fact, any dwarfs you take an interest in will just run away harder. This is a problem for the dwarven rulers to handle."

"I know that!" Ami snapped. "But I can try to arrange a cease-fire agreement so they can do something useful instead of preparing to fight me!"

Cathy shook her head, looking a little irritated. "Yeah, because they are clearly going to jump to the negotiation table immediately when they were unwilling to do so before."

"Give them some time to get used to the idea that they can't get rid of you," Jered added. "The best thing you can do right now is to get rest so you'll be thinking clearly later."

"But I can already draft plans and…" Ami started to disagree, but trailed off under the combined disapproving stares of her advisers. They might have a point.

Right now, Tiger, with the aid of imps, was doing a good job managing the youma-dwarfs. Jadeite's presence scared the more dangerous and animalistic ones away from the civilian complex, and safety tests for the de-youmafication treatment were in progress. Trying to rush those would defeat their purpose. This was one of the increasingly rare occasions where nothing urgently required Ami's attention in the immediate future.

She let her muscles relax and slumped against the backrest of her throne. "Fine, maybe you are right. I'll take a break after I finish setting up the dungeon heart and get Duke Libasheshtan's report on the state of the Light temples."

Two trolls and an orc pressed their foreheads against the red-veined floor, shivering as they knelt at the bottom of the stairs leading up to Mukrezar's throne. Droplets of sweat glistened on their bare backs, reflecting the light of the flames shooting from the deep fissures surrounding the main path.

Above them, the towering backrest worked into a horned reaper's stylized grimace scowled down at them. Its fanged expression was almost as fearsome as that of the Keeper seated underneath it.

Aside from the chattering of the minions' teeth and the crackling of the flames, all was quiet until Mukrezar's fist thudded against his armrest. The pink-haired elf leaned forward, eyes narrowed into crimson-blazing slits. "I appear to be short one tied up and crippled fake Avatar. Explain yourselves!"

The creatures before him almost broke their knobbly noses as they grovelled harder against the unyielding ground, unwilling to speak up and draw his undivided attention.

"Answer me! You, the mottled one!" A single finger stabbed forward, singling out the troll whose green skin showed patches of lighter colour.

Reluctantly, the underling raised his head out of the tiny puddle of sweat that had formed around his forehead. "Wasn't m-m-m-me, Master! Just t-t-turning winch!" he squeaked.

Mukrezar swatted lazily at the air before him, and an invisible force struck the mottled troll with a whip-like crack, forcing his head down and bouncing his chin off the floor.

"I don't want to hear excuses. I want to know why tonight's entertainment isn't ready to be slowly lowered head-first into a vat of heated fat," Mukrezar said. "Alive, that is. There's really no point doing it to a corpse. Orc, you tell me!"

The white-maned warrior glanced briefly at his whimpering companion, who was spitting out teeth, and jumped to his feet.

"Y-yes, Master!" he said, saluting. "Reporting that the prisoner s-s-slipped."

"He slipped," Mukrezar repeated, raising his hand and wriggling his fingers. "Go on, elaborate. How exactly did a man unable to move under his own power slip?"

The orc gulped. "W-well, we wrapped the chains around his shins as usual and suspended him above the pot, but then Zogig thought that for this special occasion, we should get the fresh human fat from the kitchen." He paused, pointing at the troll picking up his teeth.

The Keeper waved dismissively. "Sensible. Go on."

Shuffling his feet, the pink-skinned soldier gulped once more. "Err, yes, so we left to fetch it, but he, well, kinda slipped out of his chains and broke his neck in the empty pot."

Mukrezar growled. "I see. You bungled attaching him."

The troll who hadn't spoken yet looked up as if stung and waved his hands defensively as he protested, "No no no no! We d-done it all right and proper! Is your fault for cutting off his feet!"

The other minions cringed and turned to stare at him with wide eyes.

Three slap-like noises echoed through the room, quickly followed by cries of pain.

"Quiet, you miserable wretches! Do you have any idea what you have done? He may have been a fake Avatar, but the real one still shares his senses! I was going to gloat at him! I had this entire taunting yet soul-crushing speech prepared! The masses would have loved it!" Mukrezar complained, sighing theatrically.

"Indeed, your Wickedness," the butler imp agreed as he stepped out from behind a demonic statue. "Especially the part where he consigns a loyal, trusting follower to brutal torture and death each time he hands out one of those plagiarised rings."

The pink-haired Keeper raised an eyebrow. "You think so? Not my favourite passage, but admittedly one of the better ones."

"Actually, I was referring to the moment where his corpse would transform back into a sheep," the Butler explained as he stroked his moustache.

"What?" Mukrezar's eyes opened so wide they resembled blank crimson discs for a moment. "I was about to monologue at a common barnyard animal?" He trembled with rage, the scar across his nose standing out more as his face reddened. "How? My rings can't do that!"

"I would never insinuate that you stopped when your designs were barely functional, your Brashness. Again," the butler replied. "Also, your minions are sneaking away."

The trio froze in mid-motion when Mukrezar's stare snapped back to them. The orc stood precariously balanced on tiptoes while the two trolls were still in their kneeling position, but further back from the throne than they had started.

"Ah, yes. Off to the torture chamber with you," the elven Keeper said. With a shooing gesture, he made the three disappear, and then let himself slump in his seat. "The stupidity of it all…"

"You did achieve your primary objectives, your Sulkiness," the butler pointed out as he approached the throne, carrying a bottle of wine and an empty glass on a tablet.

"Indeed, I should focus on the bright side. Another potential mantle creation site destroyed, its defenders massacred, and a volcano rigged to explode! What more could I – nah, this isn't working!" Mukrezar threw up his hands in disgust and slumped even deeper, almost sliding off his throne. "Butler! Tell me something that will cheer me up!"

"As you wish." The smartly dressed imp poured a glass of wine and proffered it to his master. "I expect you will be delighted to hear that the dwarfs finally suffered a major defeat and lost one of their larger cities to a Keeper."

Mukrezar sat up straighter. "Hah! Someone finally got one over those hairy, drunk zealots? I'll drink to that." He emptied his glass in one go, contemplating. "Keeper Mercury's work, I assume?"

"Indeed. The Dark Empress conquered the city of Salthalls, co-opting its magical infrastructure to transform everyone within the city into strange monstrosities," the imp said, a wide grin baring his teeth.

"That's hilarious!" Mukrezar laughed. "Now I'll have to come up with something even better, or I might start to feel a little inadequate here."

The imp smiled up at him innocently. "Indeed, your Enviousness. However, may I point out that you might have a little trouble performing a ritual whose power requirements rival those for creating a new Avatar's mantle?"

The glass in Mukrezar's hand shattered as he suddenly clenched his fist. "And just like that, it stopped being funny." He shook his hand, getting rid of the bloody shards stuck inside. "But seriously," he groaned, "Is there any chance that it wasn't the city covering most of the ritual's cost? She is a freak of nature with a ridiculously unfair amount of magical power, after all."

The butler shrugged. "How should I know?" He raised his tablet just in time to block the thrown wine bottle aimed at his head. "More importantly, can you risk assuming that it was her, rather than the city?"

Mukrezar plucked the last splinters from his hand and healed his cuts, all the while keeping his eyes closed and staring straight ahead. "Going by the fact that I would be a cloud of smoke and ash if I tried channelling that much magic, I can't," he muttered sourly. "Arrgh! Now I have to add a whole bunch of nigh-invincible fortresses full of booze-guzzling vicious midgets to my list."

In the centre of the path, amidst the fire-spewing fissures, a circular section of the floor shook. Rumbling, it rose to the height of a table while its surface changed to turn into a map of the dwarven lands.

He jumped off his throne and strutted down the stairs, approaching the newly raised platform. "Salthalls, Salthalls, ah, there it is." His thumb approached one of eight glowing castle-like shapes and squished it flat. "Not so invincible as they appear. Yes. I have a good feeling about this."

"That's what you said last time, just before the glacier hit," the butler commented.

"I choose to attribute that to mere bad luck. This time will be different," Mukrezar said and snapped his fingers. A swarm of bearded beer barrels sprouted from the map around the marker he had just flattened. "The dwarven troops are busy with Mercury and not defending their cities, for one. Hmm. No doubt other Keepers will also try to take advantage of this vulnerability."

"Some opportunists softening the enemy up first will only make things easier for you," the butler said, drumming on his tablet with his three-fingered hand.

Mukrezar scratched his head. "Well, maybe. We are talking about the dwarfs here; they have a reputation. Too many losses early on and reinforcements might dry up."

"You could try not losing so many minions, your Wastefulness."

"I prefer to keep my options open," Mukrezar said as he marked the Underworld portals nearest to the dwarven cities. "Which means I'll have to bring in some actually competent subordinates for this, not just the fodder."

The imp tilted his head to the side. "Where are you going to find some of those?"

"Some of the more experienced recruits seem promising. Keeper Reebald, to start with, showed some excellent creative thinking with his combination of pressurized barrels and bile demons."

"Yes, but the Avatar got him."

Mukrezar frowned. "That's too bad. Oh well, Keeper Lavaine had a much larger force tripping over their own feet chasing her while she wiped out isolated villages. She's ripe for a promotion."

"Avatar got her."

"Curses! Then Keeper Mir will have to-"

"Avatar got h-"

A bolt of lightning from Mukrezar's finger interrupted the butler, making him twitch uncontrollably. His moustache puffed out from the static.

Mukrezar sighed. "You'd think equipping a bunch of idiot followers with dungeon hearts and ordering them to stir up trouble would result in at least some battle-hardened survivors!"

"Keeper Tagleos counts by that criterion, your Short-Temperedness," the butler noted, unperturbed by his smoking suit.

Mukrezar stared at him blankly. "Tagleos, who's Tagleos? Oh, the rat fetishist. That one's actually still around?"

"The benefits of minions with a short life cycle who are willing to work for cheese, I assume," the imp said with a shrug.

"It's a start," Mukrezar decided as he returned his attention to the map, focusing on the Mercury symbol he had planted at Salthalls. "I hope the Dark Empress appreciates all my hard work against her enemies." He looked over his shoulder at the butler. "Think I could send her a bill for services rendered?"

Last edited: Feb 22, 2019

Moving In

Ami and Tiger were having breakfast together in a small chamber that overlooked the palace's courtyard. However, the dishes with eggs and poultry currently went ignored because the crystal ball resting on the table between the girls proved much more captivating.

Tiger had dressed sharp for the occasion and replaced her corruption-eroded Sailor Mercury uniform with something that showed off less of her black-striped skin. The combination of red loincloth, metal bikini, and assorted bits of shoulder and leg armour that formed the modified reaper outfit looked right at home on her muscular frame.

In contrast, Ami was still wearing her somewhat wrinkled pyjamas. The faces in the crystal ball were familiar enough that she didn't mind not looking her best.

Within the orb, Mrs. Mizuno was listening to Tiger with rapt attention, the cup of coffee in front of her forgotten. Without the red-tinted light of the rising sun falling in through the window, her face would have been pale as a sheet.

The adopted youma, in full control of the conversation despite Ami's half-hearted efforts, was currently updating their mother on the situation at Salthalls.

Ami listened with mixed feelings. While she wasn't exactly eager to confess to her mother that she had accidentally conquered a city, leaving the explanations to Tiger wasn't optimal either.

"…and she even got the Duke on our side by-" she glanced out of the window, at the crowd several floors below, and lowered her voice. "By doing something I'm not supposed to talk about in public. It involved both of them alone locked in a room for a few hours, though!"

Sailor Mars, sitting to the side of Mrs. Mizuno, choked on her tea.

"Tiger!" Ami shouted, feeling her cheeks heat up. "It's not what she makes it sound like!" she said in the direction of the crystal ball, waving her hands. "I only worked a metal that can't be shaped by evil people, which the troops mustn't know! That's all!"

Completely ignoring Ami's reproachful glare, Tiger pointed at the transformed dwarfs outside. "Anyway, that's why all of these guys are working for us now," she finished.

Mrs. Mizuno blinked, visibly at a loss for words, and turned towards Ami for confirmation.

Ami nodded. "Yes. It was an accident," she mumbled. "I promise we are going to turn them back to normal as soon as possible!"

Sailor Mars angled her head to get a better look at the youma assembled in the courtyard. "And there are really thousands of them?" she asked, her eyes wide.

"Up to forty thousand, according to Duke Libasheshtan," Ami replied. "We aren't sure how many people managed to flee before it was too late."

"This… this is all quite a lot to take in," her mother said. She looked straight into Ami's eyes and asked, "Are you really all right, Ami? You nearly died! Multiple times!"

"I'm fine, Mum," Ami hurried to assure her, "I was possessing a golem body, so nobody managed to hurt me."

"Still, I can't help but worry," Mrs. Mizuno sighed. "Even if you aren't injured, all of this stress still isn't good for you! For a moment, I almost didn't recognise you!"

The young Keeper managed to suppress a wince. She was still in Sailor Mercury form even though she wasn't wearing her uniform. Tiger had activated the crystal ball and then addressed her as Ami, shattering the identity-concealing effect of the transformation. "Ah, that- that's probably the lighting?" she suggested, pointing at her eyes. "With the red glow, my face looks different than what you are used to."

"I- I suppose so?" her mother replied, tilting her head to the side. "It's actually rather alarming, by the way. That glow can't be good for your eyes."

"She'll be fine, she spends most of her time in a golem body for safety anyway," Tiger came to her sister's aid. "Of course, she also abuses that ability to go without sleep for days."

"Ami…" Mrs. Mizuno said, sounding disappointed.

"I only do that when it's necessary!" Ami defended herself. "I take a break when I can afford to. In fact, I just had a good night's sleep."

"Did you sleep well? No nightmares?" her mother asked.

"None," Ami answered honestly, gently shaking her head. She had expected to spend the night tossing and turning, but apparently, safety and exhaustion ensured undisturbed slumber.

"Good. That's good, I think." Mrs. Mizuno paused. "At least I hope it is. I'm no psychologist, but after everything that happened, I feared…" she trailed off. "Are you absolutely sure you are feeling all right Ami?" She stared into her daughter's eyes as if trying to see into her mind.

"Actually," Tiger interjected as she waved a hand through the space between the crystal ball and Ami's face. "Things aren't as grim as they look at first glance."

Sailor Mars scowled. "Everyone in the city got turned into youma!"

"Yes, but that also means everyone became very resilient. It's hard to deal actually life-threatening injuries to a youma," Tiger replied.

Sailor Mars nodded. "Isn't that the truth," she grumbled under her breath, speaking from experience.

"You are saying that casualties were low despite all the chaos and infighting?" Mrs. Mizuno asked, sounding sceptical but cautiously optimistic. She hesitated, her eyes darting back to Ami for a moment. "Do you have some way to confirm that even without knowing exactly how many people are missing?"

Ami nodded slowly. "My imps are supposed to collect corpses they find. So far, they haven't retrieved anything larger than a rabbit," she said. "It's not complete certainty, but I'm taking it as a good sign," she continued, trying to sounding upbeat.

Sailor Mars looked indecisive for a moment, but then pressed on and asked, "What if the dead youma simply turned into dust?"

Ami shook her head. "None of our test animals did."

"I'm relieved to hear that the… the takeover was relatively bloodless," her mother said. "You already have so much to deal with. This is all a lot to take in."

"W-well, things are actually looking up, Mum," Ami said, trying to alleviate her parent's worries. "Despite everything, I may be safer right now than I have been at any point since arriving in this world. That means I can finally focus on fixing things. If everything goes according to plan, the dwarfs should be back to normal within one to three weeks," she said with a smile.

Sailor Mars leaned in closer, looking interested. "You already have a cure?"

"One derived from animated chicken soup!" Tiger said, grinning widely when the comment earned her confused looks from within the crystal ball and an annoyed groan from Ami.

"One step of the procedure involves transforming the patient into living liquid," the latter explained.

"What?" Sailor Mars shouted, staring at her incredulously.

Mrs. Mizuno simply stared with a puzzled look. "I'm not sure I heard correctly," she said.

Ami spent the next few minutes explaining why the liquefying, filtering, mind-restoring and exorcism steps were necessary and how they led to a cured dwarf.

When she finished, Mrs. Mizuno was massaging her temples. "I'll be the first to admit that magical healing is completely outside of my area of expertise, but I have severe misgivings about just plucking pieces out of a body, even if they grow back."

"You can think of it as magical surgery, if it helps," Ami defended her method.

"I can see the similarities, Ami, and therefore I'm concerned about accidental brain surgery," her mother replied. "What happens when the malignant pieces you remove are part of the brain? There could be permanent damage to the patients' mental faculties."

Ami shuffled her feet. In a small voice, she answered, "We can't be certain, but we don't think that will happen. At least, we have strong evidence that, between youma magic and divine healing, it won't be an issue."

"That evidence is?" Mrs. Mizuno asked in a tone of voice she usually reserved for questioning ill-prepared trainees.

"Mengolin," Tiger answered before Ami could. "He's a mutated wizard who's more algae than dwarf. When he turns his head, the inside of his skull sloshes and rustles. No brain, still sane. Well, mostly sane."

"Actually, I sent him into a temple to get that fixed," Ami informed her sister. "She put both hands together as she continued, a little embarrassed. "Um, I assume it worked, because he's refusing to come back out and yelling about how I'm not going to deceive him again."

"Figures." Tiger shrugged and turned back to the crystal ball. "The important part is that he's thinking without a brain. His youma magic is compensating for the missing parts, somehow. Now, since corrupted parts of a transformed dwarf's brain are effectively useless, magic must have already taken over their function. Therefore, they can be safely removed."

Sailor Mars scratched her head, while Mrs. Mizuno was blinking rapidly with a blank look. After a few seconds, the adult woman sighed. "The more I learn about magic, the less I understand it. How does it do what it does? How does it even know what to do?"

Tiger shrugged again. "It just does. Not thinking too hard about it helps."

Mrs. Mizuno gave her a pained look. "That attitude offends my inner scientist."

"I know exactly how you feel, Mum," Ami commiserated.

"Yeah, she's absolutely terrible at working glamours on her own," Tiger confirmed smugly, "unlike her much more talented sister."

Ami swallowed a comment about the orange-skinned youma being very much an expert at not thinking things through. Instead, she said, "In any case, I have to trust Tiger's judgement here. I can't experiment on sapient beings."

"I agree completely," her mother said. "Perhaps you could start with curing only those people whose heads are clear of tumours? You might discover alternative options in the meantime."

"That's my plan," Ami said, nodding.

"Ami, there's one part I'm not getting," Sailor Mars said. "How do you plan to cure thousands in just a few weeks? If I understood you correctly, Jadeite needs about an hour to safely turn someone into a slime, and you can't manage the spell yourself."

"Oh, that," Ami said with a smile, relieved at being asked a question she could answer easily. A sheet of paper and a pencil appeared before her as she prepared to show off some math. "It's very simple actually, look here…"

Limul woke to the sight of two female faces staring down on him. He recognised Mengkun, the nervous-looking priestess from one of the local temples, but the human woman was unfamiliar to him. Strangely, it was Mengkun who was shivering when it was the human who looked as if she should feel cold. The long strands of black hair dangling down onto her chest did more to preserve her modesty than her barely-there outfit did.

He paused. Shouldn't he be embarrassed or outraged at the sight? The expected emotions stayed suspiciously absent, and so did the alarm that such a realization should entail.

"He's awake," the insufficiently covered human said, addressing someone he couldn't see. The priestess at her side glanced in the same direction and started shivering even harder.

He blinked. Instead of going black, his vision went blurry and red-tinged for a moment. That wasn't normal either. How had he ended up in this situation?

The human leaned forward and waved her black-gloved hand in front of his face.

Unimportant. The last thing he remembered was his Keeper-Empress casting a spell on him. He blinked again. Since when did he serve a Keeper, and why didn't he care that he did? He'd always thought of himself as a righteous, law-abiding dwarf.

The hand approached his face, prodding his skin with an index finger.

Oh, wait, he knew the answer to the first question. He had joined her a while after her dark magic had turned everyone into monsters, shortly after fighting his former comrades for control of the nourishment zones became unnecessary, but before he'd gotten bored and returned to his guard duties out of habit. In addition, every part of that recollection should have had him screaming in horror and revulsion, but somehow it didn't.

The digit stabbed through his cheek with a curious absence of pain. It started moving in a spiral pattern, making weird slurping noises.

At this point, he intellectually knew that he should be doing something about that. Yet, he simply didn't feel alarmed enough to bother.

"Monteraine, stop that," a young voice he recognised as belonging to the Empress said. "You are interfering with my scan."

The now identified human withdrew her finger from within his face. A trail of reddish goo stuck to the digit, stretching out into a thin thread before it came loose and snapped back to his face. He was reminded of a spring snapping back into shape.

Monteraine turned to Mengkun. "He's completely senseless. Great job messing up a simple calming spell, midget!"

The white-clad priestess took a step back. "I-I did not! I made it as strong as I could!"

Oh, so he wasn't feeling anything because of an emotion-suppressing spell. That made sense. He could definitely understand why they thought he could use one of those.

"Perhaps that's the problem?" Empress Mercury said from somewhere behind him.

Upon hearing her voice, the priestess flinched and let out a whimper through chattering teeth.

The Empress sighed. "Perhaps you could use that calming spell on yourself, Sister Mengkun?" she suggested. "Not at full power, mind you."

"Do as she says," Duke Libasheshtan's voice came from the same direction. Why was a noble like him present and apparently cooperating with the Dark Empress? Why was the priestess still complying with his orders despite this obvious corruption? As a servant of the Light, she should be holding herself to a higher standard.

"We still need to get the patient ready to talk to us," Mercury said.

Monteraine stopped waving her fingers in front of Mengkun's face, earning herself a frown from the no longer shaking priestess. "Very well, time to put him back to sleep before I cancel the current enchantment," the sorceress said. Thimbles of purplish light formed around her fingers as she pointed her hand in his direction.

Dread wasn't an emotion Limul could feel right now. If he could, he would have felt motivated to dodge the thin purple ray that cancelled the spell preventing him from becoming upset.

"AHHHHHHHHHHHHHHHH!" The patient sat up from the bed so fast that his liquid upper body whipped forward, elongating and thinning as the momentum stretched it.

Ami started in surprise, having expected a more muted reaction. It seemed as if Sister Mengkun had gone too easy on the calming spell this time. She lowered her head in sympathy. Still, she would count herself lucky if that remained the greatest problem with the curing procedure. With practice, the priestess would eventually get it right.

She also figured that the spell was at least partially working. The patient, called Limul according to the priestess, was hugging his knees and curling up into a quivering ball. It was far from optimal, but still much better than panicked flailing about with stretchy, whip-like limbs.

"NO! NO! NOOOO! LIGHT, WHY?" the liquid youma yelled between pitiful sobs. "I'M A MONSTER!"

"Soldier, pull yourself together!" Duke Libasheshtan barked in a voice used to command. "Your behaviour is unbecoming of a member of the Guard!"

On reflex, Limul jumped to attention with a picture-perfect salute. It was fortunate that the bed sheet covering his body adhered to his liquid skin, as putting clothes on a slime had proved impossible. He stood still for a moment, but then his right eye started twitching when he noticed that the fingers of his balled fist were merging into a single whole.

"My existence is unbecoming of a member of Guard!" he howled as he sat down on the bed with a defeated moan, head and shoulders hanging. "I'm no longer a dwarf! I'm an abomination! Worse, I'm a Keeper minion!"

"Um, at least turning you back into a dwarf can be done in an instant," Ami spoke up, wringing her hands guiltily.

Slowly, the liquid youma turned his head in her direction, as if scared of what he would find. His entire body went rigid when he confirmed that yes, the Dark Empress was in the room and yes, she was looking straight at him. His eyes went wide, far wider than they could have if his body was solid, until they looked as if they would fall from his skull.

"E-E-Empress," he finally managed to choke out, falling over as he tried to simultaneously bow and drop to his knees."

"Please, get up," she said in a friendly voice when it looked as if he would remain sprawled out on the floor, resembling a half melted wax figure. "I do apologise for the inconveniences," she added. "You are the first dwarf we are trying to turn back to normal, and the procedure still has some flaws."

In the back of the room, Sister Mengkun tried to shuffle farther out of Ami's line of sight unnoticed.

"Y-your Imperial M-Majesty?" Limul asked as he looked up at her in surprise before hurriedly lowering his gaze.

"You were supposed to wake up calm enough to read all the explanations we prepared in advance," she gestured at a small pamphlet lying untouched on the nightstand. "Ideally, you would have known that you are going to be turned back to normal before you could worry about your current fluid state. It's just a necessary step before you can be transformed back into a regular dwarf. I intend to cure everyone in Salthalls eventually."

The transformed dwarf, still kneeling, swallowed as he looked at his hands. His arms were drooping like wet noodles, arching at the elbows. "T-Truly? This is reversible?" he whispered, his face vacillating between disbelief and hope.

Ami smiled. "At this point, all it takes is a simple exorcism."

His eyes darted over to the priestess for an instant before his gaze locked onto Ami's boots again. "C-could you…?"

"Just one moment, please. I'll need your help curing the other dwarfs too," she said.

"Mine?" Limul answered, his shoulders straightening. "But I'm a simple soldier, not a mage. How could I possibly help?"

"Right now, you are a type of creature called a 'youma'," Ami told him. "That means you have a natural affinity for the kind of magic required." She telekinetically moved the pamphlet over to him. "Please read page two, which explains the necessity of the liquid phase."

Limul flinched as the levitating paper touched his hand but started reading as instructed. After a while, he lowered the pamphlet and said "Your Imperial Majesty? If I understand this correctly, the liquid transformation is required to remove corrupted flesh that would kill the victim during the exorcism?"

Ami nodded enthusiastically. "Exactly! However, I currently have exactly one person who can turn patients into liquid youma, and he can only manage around ten of them a day. As a youma, you have the potential to learn the technique, too."

Limul's shoulders slumped in resignation. "A-as a youma. You want me to stay like this. V-very well, if that is the price for being cured eventually..."

"It's not a price," she replied, waving her hands defensively. "If you refuse or turn out to not have the required talent, you will be restored back to normal immediately. It's delicate magic, someone coerced into assisting couldn't be trusted to help anyways."

Duke Libasheshtan took a step forward. "It is, however, only a minor inconvenience. Consider this: if only two out of every ten people cured can help cure more people, then we can already cure thirty people tomorrow. If, again, six out of those thirty people have the talent, then we can cure ninety people the day after. Two-hundred and seventy the day after. Over eight-hundred the next. After a little more than a week, every citizen of Salthalls could be back to normal. Will you delay your own cure for less than a fortnight to help your people, soldier?"

Limul's stance shifted the moment he made his decision. His spine straightened, making his slouch disappear, and he raised his head as he saluted. "I will serve, your Grace! It is a small sacrifice on the way to restoring what's left of my honour!"

"Great!" Ami clapped her hands together happily. "Prepare yourself; I will transport you straight to your new teacher, General Jadeite. And keep the pamphlet, it will answer most of your questions about living arrangements."

The moment Limul looked from Duke Libasheshtan back at Ami, his newly gained confidence fled him. "Y-yes, your Imperial Majesty," he replied with a shudder that made most of his jelly-like body wobble.

She transported him to his new destination and addressed her other assistants. "Monteraine, Sister Mengkun, go prepare the next patient, please."

The priestess bowed repeatedly in Ami's direction as she fled backwards towards the exit, almost bumping into the smirking Monteraine in the process.

"That could have gone better," Ami commented, looking at the empty bed. "Still, it wasn't too bad for a first attempt. Thanks for convincing him to cooperate."

The Duke frowned. "You do remember that we do not have enough priests to perform exorcisms on hundreds or thousands of victims a day, right? It feels distasteful to deceive him about the expected length of his service."

"Being unable to immediately complete the final step won't stop us from slimifying everyone," she contradicted. "In fact, building up a backlog of exorcism-ready liquid youma could be beneficial."

The dwarven noble crossed his arms. "Is this going to be part of one of those convoluted plans you are famous for?" he asked.

"No, I'm simply hoping that it will be politically unfeasible for your countrymen to reject a plea to let victims be restored at their temples. Which would require them to open communications to discuss the details with me," she explained with a satisfied smile.

"Does that mean I can skip the regularly scheduled fruitless attempts until then?" the Duke asked, his expression brightening.

"No, but you can already tempt them into talking with the prospect of saving the citizens of Salthalls in the near future," she replied, looking apologetic.

"I'm sure the part about turning everyone into slimes will make them take me more seriously," he grumbled.

Duke Libasheshtan withdrew the arm he had wrapped around Umbra's waist, splitting up the inky shape formed by their combined silhouettes. Still disoriented by the teleport, the dwarf took a stumbling step away from the taller youma.

Ami looked up from her computer's display and down the table lined with empty chairs. As she watched, shadows peeled themselves off her two visitors and dissolved on the floor tiles.

"Empress," Umbra said, inclining her masked and hooded head in greeting.

The Duke squinted, blinking rapidly to adapt his vision to the sudden brightness. Luminous crystal squares shone at him from all of the chalk-white walls, seamlessly integrated into the room's geometrical engravings. After a moment, he managed to spot Ami at the other end of the room, and he turned to face her. "Your Imperial Majesty," he greeted as he bowed.

"Duke Libasheshtan," she acknowledged as she rose from of her chair to return his bow.

He froze for a split-second, his gaze lowering and the corners of his mouth twitching downwards briefly before returning to a neutral expression.

Following his gaze, she quickly identified the issue. While standing, a small section of bare skin had become visible between the gold-rimmed hem of her dress and the surface of the table. While the black garment felt as if it had shrunk a size, it was still at least as long as her senshi uniform's skirt.

Nevertheless, she sat back down quickly, sinking into her seat's thick padding. The dress wasn't particularly scandalous by her own standards, but she still felt her cheeks heat up due to the dwarf's disapproval. So much for making a professional, dignified impression despite the corruption effects eroding her wardrobe.

Avoiding the Duke's gaze, she focused on Umbra's masked and hooded face instead. "Umbra, you may leave until the Duke has need of transport again."

The youma nodded and disappeared in an expanding wave of shadows that briefly made the lights flicker.

Walking across the impeccably clean floor tiles, Duke Libasheshtan approached the table.

"How did it go?" Ami asked him expectantly, shifting on her chair. Proportioned for a dwarf, it was too wide for her. Even with the fabric of her cloak bunching up over its armrests, she didn't manage to fill up enough space and resembled a small child sitting on an adult's seat.

The Duke's lips tightened in annoyance. "Poorly. I'm afraid you won't be talking to any dwarven diplomats today," he replied, briefly glancing at the inactive crystal ball to the right of her computer. Less utilitarian than regular models, it rested on a silver pedestal with decorative carvings and tiny embedded gems.

Ami's eager anticipation turned to disappointment, which she was unable to out of her voice. "Really? I admit I was expecting better news after you remained in the temple for so long."

The Duke pulled out the chair closest to her left. "Don't remind me," he grumbled. "So much time wasted talking to clerks who go on and on without saying anything of consequence." Shaking his head, he let himself drop into his seat. "Do you mind?" he asked, gesturing towards the tablet with silver goblets and a bottle, which, according to him, were a traditional staple of dwarven negotiations.

Ami pushed it closer to him, not seeing a reason to worsen his mood.

"As I said, I wasn't able to contact anybody important," the black-bearded dwarf continued as he poured himself a drink. He looked at Ami the whole time his hands moved, but somehow didn't spill a single drop. "I assume there are orders to keep me from interacting with anyone in a position of power. And also to encourage me subtly," he rolled his eyes, "to find the nearest hero gate and escape."

"That's unfortunate." Ami lowered her head, frowning at her reflection in the table's glass-sheathed wooden surface. Sighing, she reached up to her forehead to remove the weighty crown-like tiara she had put on in preparation for a diplomatic meeting.

A surprised choking noise came from the Duke's direction. Cross-eyed, he stared into his goblet for a moment before tilting his head to the side and meeting her gaze. "Grape juice?" he asked in an incredulous voice. His perplexed expression urged her to explain herself.

She sank a little deeper into her seat. "I'm too young to drink. Even if I wasn't, I would try to keep my head clear until I was off-duty," she said quickly. "Anyway, I was really expecting that there would be progress with everything we are doing and with a Duke arguing in my favour."

The noble in question shrugged. "Your mistake is assuming that my title would exempt me from the laws about not negotiating with Keepers or their servants. In fact, I have to choose my words very carefully to avoid giving the impression that I am working for you."

Ami steadied her elbows on the table and rested her head on her hands. "Your laws are irritating. I can't negotiate with the King personally. I can't order anyone to negotiate on my behalf either," she summarised her dilemma.

"They are meant to prevent non-violent interaction with Keepers," the Duke pointed out.

Ami narrowed her eyes at him. "That's- that's just…" She groaned in frustration. "Do I really have to conquer the entire kingdom just to make peace?"

Paling, the Duke sat up straighter. "Please don't," he said in a flat voice.

"Don't worry, I wasn't serious," she assured the alarmed dwarf, making him relax fractionally. "Why would anyone think those laws were a good idea in the first place?" she asked tiredly.

Duke Libasheshtan cleared his throat. "Well, it made sense in context," he said. "Not listening to Keeper Bartholomeus would have avoided a civil war and a third of our nobles going into exile in disgrace." His teeth clenched and he looked down, his gaze unfocused.

She paused while he relived unpleasant memories, pondering. Quickly, she made the connection between the poorly regarded dwarfs in Sirith Anlur who couldn't work adamantine and the disgraced exiles. It figured that the only dwarfs she could potentially convince to exert political pressure on her behalf didn't have any influence worth mentioning. "Is there really nothing that could convince King Ral that I have peaceful intentions?" she asked after a moment.

The Duke stopped brooding and hesitated for only a moment. "Short of digging up the adamantine prison, putting it on a train, and sending it to him? No. I doubt there's anything aside from inspecting the damage himself that could make him reconsider his stance."

"Tempting, but it would get me killed," she replied. "Too many people would handle it to preserve the secret about my true allegiance."

"Your minions," the Duke said, "how much do they know about adamantine? Could you not pretend that you broke through under your own power?"

Ami briefly considered the most likely outcome. "I'm sure some of the dark gods would gleefully set them straight. Though, with my luck, I wouldn't be surprised if King Ral believed me."

Duke Libasheshtan didn't smile at her attempt at levity. Instead, he slowly looked her up and down, stroking his beard as he let out a drawn-out humming noise. Just as she was getting uncomfortable under his measuring gaze, he started muttering, "Perhaps… yes, with your Empress title…"

"You have a new idea?" she asked, perking up.

"Yes. I believe it's workable, but I will have to refresh my memory on family and succession laws relating to foreign nobility before I can be certain."

"Why would you-" She gasped as she made the connection, and her skin tingled.

To get around her diplomatic obstacles, she needed someone who didn't work for her and wasn't her subject, but who could still negotiate in her name…

Cheeks burning, she jumped to her feet. "I- I'm not marrying anyone!"

Reluctant Overtures

"Jered, this is serious," Cathy drawled, frowning at her boyfriend. Her arm twitched, but his ribcage was sadly not in elbowing reach even though he was sitting right next to her.

The wavy-haired man was bending forward so much that his forehead touched the top of the same table he was slapping with his right hand, chuckling to himself. "I'm just imagining their faces when Mercury drops that bit of news on them," he said and promptly dissolved into another round of chuckles.

Ami, seated across from him, felt her cheeks starting to heat up. "I'm not seeing what's so absurd about the notion," she stated, pulling her arms closer to her chest.

"It's, well, it's unprecedented, at least," Cathy said. "I'm assuming the Duke," her eyes flicked over to an empty chair briefly, "knows what he's talking about, so I'm not saying it's impossible, but, given your situation, it sounds like it should be."

"It's not like it costs me anything to try," Ami replied.

"That's not exactly correct," Jered objected. He rose to an upright position, his grin fading into a more business-like expression. "You may want to start thinking in terms of political capital," he said. "While the Avatar might only be a little annoyed at your request for wasting his time if Duke Libasheshtan fails to convince him, you'll definitely owe him a favour if he goes along with your plan."

Ami nodded, accepting his point.

"More importantly though," Cathy said, "what's going to stop the dwarfs from continuing to ignore you? It's not like they'll want to talk to you just because it's no longer legally impossible."

Ami smiled. "Well, I'm hoping to make them believe that this will annoy me more than them."

"… one saving grace is that trains can't turn quickly, which helps us by keeping the required density of the detection grid lower than their size would suggest," Duke Uzolgim said, adjusting his spectacles.

"Low enough to afford it?" Duke Cattenor asked while he continued frowning at the papers before him.

Duke Uzolgim hesitated. "If we prioritize it over everything else, yes," he offered cautiously.

"That's a 'no' then," Cattenor sighed.

"We can't not do anything about it!" Duke Alnisalath said loudly. "Troops moving undetected underground is a nightmare already; mobile dungeon hearts are so much worse!"

"Which is why we are scrying on the individual trains as a workaround," Countess Lalimush said. "As long as we don't miss any new ones she builds, it's even somewhat workable."

"And ties up wizards that would be much more useful keeping an eye on the other Keepers," Duke Cattenor sighed. He looked up from his calculations for the first time. "Do we actually have any indications that Keeper Mercury is planning another attack in the near future?"

"Her building up an army of fluid monsters that would be perfect for slipping through our underground defences is a pretty strong hint," Duke Omerreg pointed out.

"Can't shift too many resources then," Cattenor agreed with a pained nod.

King Ral lamented that this strategy meeting was shaping up to prove just as fruitless as the ones that came before it. From his place of honour at the head of the table, he swept his gaze over the long faces of the Dukes and Duchesses sitting with him.

So far, the collected nobles were proving themselves much better at emptying wine bottles than at coming up with viable plans. Looking down at his own blank list of suggestions, he forcibly fought down the urge to order a drink with a little more kick.

"Sire?" Someone called out in a low voice.

The elderly king turned his head towards the hooded wizard approaching him with a glowing crystal ball. Unexpected calls weren't uncommon in times of war, but they usually meant dreadful news. "Put it over there," King Ral sighed, pointing at a spot where the tablecloth was relatively free of maps and papers.

"At once, Sire," the robed mage confirmed.

"Am I calling at a bad time?" the voice from the crystal ball asked barely a moment after the device had come to a rest.

"Lord Avatar!" King Ral's posture straightened when he recognised the red-bearded face in the orb, his morose mood brightening. "Have you reconsidered? Are you going to assist us in this dark hour, after all?"

Around the table, the nobles leaned in closer, more attentive than they had been since the beginning of the meeting.

The Avatar raised an eyebrow. "If you are referring to Empress Mercury, then yes," he said, nodding slowly. "However!" he added, pre-empting premature cheers, "My assistance will take a more indirect form than you are probably expecting."

King Ral closed his mouth, his momentary elation dampened. "Any and all help will be warmly welcomed," he said after a moment, "Though I find myself curious about what you mean with 'indirect assistance'."

"It's very simple," the Avatar said. "King Ral, Duchesses Ducimezar and Lalimush, Dukes Omerreg, Uzolgim, Cattenor and Alnisalath," he nodded briefly in the direction of each of the nobles as he said their name. Now having their undivided attention, he proclaimed, "I am hereby officially appointing Duke Libasheshtan as Empress Mercury's regent."

King Ral felt his jaw fall open as he forgot to breathe for a moment. Stupefied, he stared at the crystal ball.

Not all of his council took the announcement as quietly. Amidst gasps and the sound of Duke Omerreg ripping one of his notes in two, there were shouts.

"WHAT?" Duke Alnisalath had shot to his feet so quickly that his chair fell over and made a muffled thudding noise on the thick carpet.

"HAVE YOU LOST YOUR MIND?" Duchess Ducimezar asked, quick as always to make her displeasure known.

"I am quite sane, I assure you," the Avatar replied cheerfully, looking unperturbed.

King Ral felt his own ire rise. What was Amadeus thinking, raising their hopes only to dash them? Was this some kind of sick joke? Worse, if he were serious then he'd be adding legitimacy to that Keeper's title!

"You can't do that," King Ral heard himself say.

"Underage; no liege; no vassals; no suitable family members," the Avatar listed calmly, raising one finger with each point. "I most certainly can appoint an appropriate guardian in situation like those, rare as they may be."

"That's not-" King Ral began, but thought better of it. "All questions of appropriateness and authority aside, why would you do that?"

"Simple. If Mercury likes to play at being an Empress, then why should we spare her the inconveniences and obligations that come with such a title?"

"Because it would mean treating her like a legitimate noble!" Duke Alnisalath said with a scowl.

"Which is preposterous," the King agreed. "She is a Keeper."

The Avatar shrugged and let his gaze linger briefly on the empty suggestion sheets on the table. "I take it that you have a better option for making her life difficult, then? Or any at all?"

The resulting silence was answer enough.

"There you go then," the Avatar continued. "I gave you a tool to put pressure on her where you had none before."

King Ral forced down his anger enough to give the idea some serious consideration. His expression soured. "This plan of yours puts Duke Libasheshtan in a great amount of danger for nebulous benefits," he said. "You are putting him in a position where he has to intentionally irritate and annoy the powerful Keeper who is holding him captive."

"I doubt giving him some actual power, even if it's dependent on Mercury's willingness to play along, will increase the danger he's in," the Avatar said. "She apparently wants to be taken seriously as an empress, which means that she has to at least keep up the appearance of sticking to the rules."

"I do like the idea of forcing her to expose her rule as the sham it is," Duke Omerreg said, nodding along thoughtfully.

"Oh, can we have Thol just ground the brat until she's of age?" Duchess Lalimush suggested with an eager grin.

The Avatar's face in the crystal ball turned to shoot her a flat look. "I expect you would be disappointed by the results. She's more than happy to stay with her books unless forced into action, as I have repeatedly pointed out before."

King Ral snorted. The day he started to believe that the Dark Empress had an elaborate city conquest plan just lying around with no intention to use it was the day he'd abdicate due to senility. Unwilling to rehash the point, he asked instead, "Lord Avatar, why select Duke Libasheshtan for this role? Why the captive Duke of a nation she is at war with, rather than someone safer from her retribution?"

"Two reasons. The first is Salthalls. It's the only one of Mercury's current holdings that requires administration, and there's nobody more qualified for the job than him. He'll be in the best possible position to minimize further damage to the city and its inhabitants.

The second reason is that it actually improves his safety."

"Please elaborate," King Ral prompted, his words sounding more sceptical than he intended to reveal.

"It turns him into an irreplaceable asset for Mercury. Someone who can make deals on behalf of her Empire without working directly for her. As the only available liaison with you, she'll also have no choice about letting him regularly visit temples to stay in contact and prove that he remains uncompromised."

King Ral frowned. The explanation made a twisted kind of sense, even if it offended his sensibilities. With a deep sigh, he nodded once. "I hate it, but it seems at least like a feasible course of action. Duke Cattenor, what's your take on this?"

The Duke stopped leafing through his sheets. "I'm sure I can think of a few ways to hamper her war effort by keeping her busy with keeping up appearances," he said, baring his teeth in a vicious grin.

"You seem to have things well in hand," the Avatar commented. "Very well then. Please inform the Duke of his promotion at your earliest convenience." He inclined his head briefly before his crystal ball went blank.

King Ral stroked his bushy white beard as he shifted to sit more comfortably and considered the… surprise… the Avatar had just ambushed them with. "So," he said, dragging out the word, "what do you think? Are we better off pretending this never happened?"

The various nobles were quiet, unsure if he was jesting. He wasn't really sure himself. Finally, Duke Omerreg spoke up "Distasteful as the concept may be, I think it offers opportunities to gain intelligence on the Dark Empress' intentions. Tell me what you think of this plan..."

Gleaming forks, knives and spoons formed an elaborate arrangement around Ami's plate. With some hesitation, she selected one of the more silvery-looking spoons and prepared to crack the cooked egg open.

"Close, but incorrect, your Imperial Majesty" Duke Libasheshtan interrupted with a stern look. He was seated to her right, directly across from Tiger to her left. "The egg-breaking ladle is the one over there."

"Why are we doing this again?" Her adopted sister asked. Tiger's slouched posture gained her another stern look from the Duke, which she ignored. Like Ami and the other women at the long table, she was wearing the dwarven version of a long evening dress. Imps positioned strategically around the room with the sole task of watching the diners prevented corruption-induced alterations in an unobserved moment.

"Because making sure that her Majesty or her sister don't embarrass themselves by being ignorant of proper etiquette is part of my duties now," the black-bearded dwarf replied, sounding resigned.

"And we just happen to be collateral damage?" Cathy asked. The swordswoman sat further down the table, across from Jered. Despite her words, she seemed to be actually enjoying the atmosphere.

"You are some of the more presentable members of her Majesty's forces, and thus may be required to appear at public functions. It would, therefore, be wasteful not to have you sit in on these lessons," Duke Libasheshtan explained.

Ami glanced up at the figures sitting past Snyder and Torian. Her gaze briefly lingered on Jadeite, who looked quite dashing in the dwarven style formal shirt and vest. Snyder, wearing something similar, appeared less comfortable without his acolyte robes. No, never mind, that seemed to be Venna's fault. If the Duke could see under the table what the dark elf was doing to the redhead with her foot, he would certainly have reprimanded her.

Further down the table, Torian was the only one who had forgone the dwarf-inspired formal style. The head warlock had opted for stiff black robes with wide silver trim instead, proudly displaying his mastery symbols on the opulent cloth. He visibly perked up at the mention of possible promotions.

Unlike him, the warlocks and dark elves she was less familiar with sat stiffly in their seats, their expressions rigid. Some of their pasty faces gleamed with sweat. Only the youma Landra provided a dash of green colour among the general pallor.

Ami could understand their unease to a degree. The prospect of more prominent positions didn't exactly balance out her own presence. Nobody wanted to mess up in front of the boss, especially when said boss was an Empress and worse, a Keeper.

Perhaps they would feel more comfortable if she gave them more context on what was going on? "I certainly wasn't expecting the dwarfs' first demand to be a gala to publicly announce your new position as Regent of my empire," she told the Duke.

"They are testing the waters," the dwarf replied. "That's why they are asking for a relatively tiny concession that's still inconvenient and will waste your time."

"Wanting to laugh at her for being an ill-mannered peasant unfamiliar with the etiquette doesn't factor into it at all, I'm sure," Cathy commented, apparently unconcerned that her grip on her wine glass was not perfectly traditional.

"We should just make our own," Tiger moaned. "Etiquette I mean. Our empire doesn't have an established tradition yet, so whatever the Empress says goes, right? She'd define what was appropriate and formal, even if it was something involving racy-"

"Tiger, no!" Ami interrupted quickly, shaking her head.

"That's quite enough, your Highness," Duke Libasheshtan said. "The idea is to not offend the other party. Besides, as the acting Regent, it would still be up to me to set the empire's standards."

The striped youma narrowed her eyes at him but didn't protest.

"Your Majesty, if I may?" Torian broke the momentary silence. "This seems like as good an opportunity as any to clarify a point I am confused about. What does the chain of command looks like now that it includes Duke Libasheshtan? Are we supposed to take orders from him, or..." he trailed off, looking rather dubious about the arrangement.

Some of the other employees at leaned in closer in interest.

"You continue to take your orders directly from me," Ami answered. There was no way she would allow her enemies that much influence over her armed forces. "Technically speaking, all of you are my mercenaries and not citizens or soldiers of my empire. As such, he has no direct authority over you."

Torian nodded, and so did some of the people seated farther away. "I see. Thank you for answering my question to my fullest satisfaction, your Majesty." He directed a smug smile in the Duke's direction.

"However," Ami continued, "You will have to keep in mind that he is also in charge of upholding the laws of the empire, so if you broke them, he would be within his rights to have you dealt with accordingly."

The warlock raised an eyebrow. "I assume those situations are purely hypothetical as we don't have an official code of law yet?"

She paused for a moment, considering. "For now. That's not a sustainable state though. There will need to be clear rules when more and more of the locals return to sanity."

"They will be used to the previous laws, your Imperial Majesty," Duke Libasheshtan pointed out. "It would cause the least disruption to simply carry them over, with adequate adaptations for your particular situation, of course."

"It would be a lot of work to ensure no loopholes that could be used against me remain," Ami noted. "Slow, painstaking work." She winced when another thought struck her. "The dwarfs will be pushing for this, won't they?"

Jered nodded. "Yep. Citing rule of law as a prerequisite for diplomatic deals to stall any progress while still appearing reasonable sounds like just the kind of thing they would do."

Ami sighed. "Right. I will-" she stopped and turned to the dwarf sitting to her right. "Or rather, Duke Libasheshtan will have to hire some professionals to work out the details on behalf of the empire."

"You want to trust lawyers with this?" the Duke asked, sounding bemused. "I suppose that's feasible, with sufficient supervision. I can contact a few reliable ones when I go prepare the gala."

"In your southern holdings, right." Jered said. No diplomats wanted to visit Salthalls for obvious reasons. "I'll need the exact location and timetable as soon as you have made the arrangements so I can make some of my own."

"Additional security?" the Duke asked. "I hardly see a reason for that. Who in their right mind would want to get into a fight with the Empress after recent events?"

"You misunderstand," Jered waved his hand. "I simply intend to make sure that the event will receive sufficient public attention. It would be unfortunate if the dwarfs decided that things with the regency weren't going the way they liked, and therefore pretended that it never happened."

Duke Libasheshtan blinked, but didn't deny that the possibility existed. "Fine, but that will raise expectations. The absence of the fairy ambassador in anything but pristine condition would raise concerns about the safety of future diplomats, for example."

Ami leaned forward. "Torian, I told you a while ago to search for the fairy sisters?"

"Indeed you did," the head warlock confirmed. "I am aware of their location and foresee no notable difficulties in collecting them." His toothy smile wavered a little. "Though there is something a little odd going on with one of them."

Last edited: Jan 17, 2020

Odd Discoveries

Torian had claimed a corner of the palace's library as his office. His desk stood hidden in the shadow of a bookshelf that touched the ceiling, and he had even hung a dividing curtain to dim the light further. The twilight wasn't ideal for reading or working, but it did make the images within his crystal ball easier to see.

Seated in his looming chair, the warlock waved pale fingers over the glowing orb as he zoomed in on a particularly fluffy and plump youma. "And the fuzzball menace to carpets everywhere over there is the Ambassador."

Ami, seated across from him, nodded. Using the image in the scrying device as a reference, she sought out the transformed fairy with her Keeper sight for a closer look. With two fur-covered wings emerging from beneath her long, blonde mane like floppy ears, she reminded Ami of a well-fed rabbit. The young Keeper briefly pondered running her fingers through the soft, inviting-looking fur, and then sighed. Not only would doing so be inappropriate, it would also be completely mortifying if Camilla remembered it once cured.

When she focused on Torian again, he seemed to be studying her face with a knowing look. "Be advised that the fluff she sheds paralyzes on touch," he said.

"R-Right, I'll warn Jadeite," she said quickly and faced away from him, mildly embarrassed. Like the overwhelming majority of the new youma, Camilla had a minion link, which was likely to cause both her and Ami a lot of trouble in the future. In the meantime, it meant that transporting her into one of the waiting rooms for the high-priority patients took only a moment of concentration. Scribbling a warning on the door with a telekinetically controlled piece of chalk didn't take much longer.

As soon as the fairy disappeared from Torian's view, he started waving his fingers over the crystal ball again. "Ah, here we go, your Majesty. Our healers will need a larger tub for that one."

Ami focused on the amethyst-coloured figure visible in the orb. Crystalline carapace formed an exoskeleton around a female figure who towered over the surrounding youma as she walked in a hunched position, her head scraping against the ceiling. Her right arm was much larger and thicker than the left, easily reaching the ground.

"That one can change her size, fully or in part," Torian explained. "Your Majesty, I recommend putting her in a sealed room with sturdy walls, because she can shrink down and squeeze through any small gap."

"Indeed?" Ami had a better idea and transported the mutated fairy into a regular jail cell with a barred door instead.

The confused youma turned her head to look at her new surroundings for a moment before walking towards the bars, losing height with every step.

Ami hit her with a sleeping spell when she was about the size of a doll. The healers would be grateful for not having to haul around a creature that, in her estimation, weighed about as much as a fully-grown cow.

"The next one makes me a little dizzy," Torian confessed.

It took Ami a split-second to notice that his crystal ball wasn't showing an empty corridor. There was one spot where the brickwork distorted and curved. She squinted, trying to make sense of the strange way light and shadows failed to outline contours properly.

A quick inspection with Keeper sight revealed that she was looking at a purely optical phenomenon, rather than some patch of twisted space. A faceless youma with smooth, reflective skin sat in the exact centre of an equally reflective disc-shaped patch of ground.

"She's surrounded by a field that makes every surface inside act like a mirror," Torian elaborated. "It doesn't seem to interfere with friction, but everyone inside is blind until-"

Ami jerked upright, prompting the warlock to stop talking and look at her in surprise. She held up her palm, signalling him to wait for a moment while she investigated the sudden alert she had received from her dungeon.

Some of her underlings were fighting. Given their nature, brawls and violence weren't uncommon, but this time, she sensed that someone without a minion link was involved.

She willed her Keeper Sight towards the source of the alert, and it jumped to a district of the city she hadn't personally visited yet. She found herself looking at a corridor junction where three residential alleys merged into a larger shopping district.

On the ground, three prone trolls flailed around in an oily bluish puddle. A fourth held onto a tall statue, his green arms wrapped around its waist. Sculpted granite armour pressed uncomfortably into his skin as he tried to remain upright, his kicking feet failing to find purchase on the stained cobblestones.

A bit ahead of the slippery puddle, the leader of the team was lying on his back, a footprint-shaped bruise on his face slowly turning a deeper shade of green.

The culprits hadn't gotten far yet. A blur consisting of two female figures was racing down the street. The youma in the lead had yellowed, wrinkled skin and obviously some kind of speed-related magic. Her partner in crime trailed behind her like a banner fluttering in the wind, one elongated, stretchy arm trapped in the faster youma's grip.

"Don't let them get you!" the former yelled. "They are melting people into goo!"

Ami suddenly flinched as a façade covered in figurine-holding alcoves entered her field of view. With her Keeper Sight, it felt like the equivalent of the sun suddenly shining into her eyes without warning. She was looking at holy ground.

The sensation was more startling than unpleasant, but it distracted her long enough for the door to slam shut behind the two fleeing youma.

Opening her eyes, Ami lowered her arm. "The team supposed to retrieve the first two fairies failed. They have taken refuge in a small shrine." She could detect a minion link to the rubbery youma, but her sane sister's grip on her arm prevented Ami from just transporting the "prisoner" away.

"I'm sure a number of bored minions would be happy to drag them back out for you," Torian suggested with an eager grin.

"Better to just send their sisters once they are cured," Ami replied absently while she telekinetically pushed the fallen trolls onto less slippery terrain. Looking at Torian she asked, "Who's next?"

The scrying orb fogged up briefly underneath the warlock's touch before it focused on the next fairy.

Ami's eyebrows rose. "I thought you wanted to keep the odd one for last?"

She was looking at an emaciated being with enough branching limbs to look like a cross between a skeleton, a spider, and a leafless bush. Series of holes ran down the thin, bone-coloured appendages, giving them a flute-like appearance.

Ami shifted uncomfortably when she noted that similar holes in the youma's forehead let her see right into the bald skull. It seemed to be as hollow as the rest of the limbs. She wondered how the mutated fairy was even alive, though her functional minion link left no doubt that she was.

Torian looked up at her and blinked. "That isn't the oddity," he said in a surprised tone.

Ami was dreading to learn what the warlock considered odd if he took that kind of weirdness in stride. Wait, no, she had seen six mutated fairies so far, so the last could only be the dragon-like one she had briefly encountered in the casting chamber.

"All right." Ami took a deep breath and considered the flailing flute-spider thing again. "I think we better hold off on trying to heal that one before we are completely confident that the slime method will work on her."

"Very well, your Majesty." Torian made his crystal ball change perspective again. "On to the one I figured you might take a personal interest in."

The image in the sphere changed to show a treasure chamber with the chequered floor common to those constructed by Ami. It was otherwise unremarkable, aside from not containing any treasure.

Ami didn't need to verify its coordinates to recognise it as the treasury she had created near her railway station to temporarily stash the wealth arriving by train from her abandoned Whitemountain dungeon.

Right now, the room should have been empty. Instead, it contained a crowd of youma and a large, snoring dragon, who had curled up like a dog sleeping in its basket. Aside from the dragon, everyone was looking at the red-scaled figure resting in the crook formed by the dragon's body as if it was her own personal armchair.

Blinking, Ami took a closer look at the transformed fairy leaning her back against the fire-breathing lizard's flank and using his tail as a footrest. Had she sought ought dragons when reminded of her siblings? It made a little sense, but it didn't even begin to explain what Ami was looking at here.

There were several things wrong with the situation, and not just because dragons generally didn't cuddle or sleep in empty treasuries. Youma shuffling towards the fairy in a small procession to offer their hard-won shards of crystallised black mana as tribute went against everything Ami knew about their behaviour.

An imp joining them with her own contribution for the pile pushed the situation from strange to outright alarming.

"You were right to bring this to my attention," Ami said, instinctively lowering her voice as if the creatures in the treasury could overhear her.

Torian lowered his head in a shallow bow, a self-satisfied smile on his face. "Glad I could be of service, your Majesty."

Ami nodded absently as she considered the situation. The transformed fairy, whom she tentatively assumed to be Anise due to her red colour, had gained a minion link since she met her, most likely when Salthalls had become Ami's territory. While diplomatically problematic, it was good news in this particular situation. Someone outside of the dungeon's chain of command being able to influence her imps to such a degree could be disastrous.

Wanting to see how much her control over the imp was compromised, she ordered the crystal-carrying worker to leave.

Without hesitation, the imp turned around and started running towards the chamber's exit.

The horned fairy's half-lidded expression changed into a wide-eyed look of surprise before turning into a frown. Staring at the imp's back, she leaned forward to reach into the pile of mana shards on the floor in front of her.

For a moment, the imp looked confused, and then turned around again to take a spot at the back of the procession.

Ami positioned her Keeper sight for a better look, frowning as she thought about what she had observed. Whatever magical ability Anise was using to control her entourage wasn't registering as an attack to the dungeon heart. She hadn't tried to use it when she had briefly confronted Ami in the casting chamber, so perhaps it was something she had only recently learned.

With a repeated order from Ami, the imp turned around once again and ran towards the exit.

Now visibly irritated, the fairy-youma reached into the pile of black crystals again, giving Ami's zoomed-in Keeper Sight a great view of what she was doing. Her hand didn't just close randomly around one of the shards. Instead, she aimed straight for one specific crystal at the bottom of the pile that looked very different from the others. Bright, clear and elongated, it looked perfectly symmetrical and intact, unlike the uneven shards surrounding it.

Within the transparent material, a faint pattern lit up briefly when Anise placed two fingers on one of the crystal's sides.

The imp returned to the back of the file of youma once again, and the circuit-like designs flickering within the clear gem winked out.

Ami considered the strange crystal. Was it something Anise had created herself? With its clean lines and almost technological look, it didn't fit the mutated fairy's dragon theme. She could have taken it from some other youma or even found it in the city. In any case, its origin was less important than stopping it from affecting Ami's employees. She could just ask the fairy where she got it later, once she was back to normal.

Being currently unattended, the mysterious gem could simply be picked up with Keeper Transport, which Ami did. She felt a little resistance from the crystal sticking to the ground somehow, but it came loose with a sharp popping noise nevertheless.

Anise gasped the instant the gem disappeared into storage. With a cry of despair, she launched herself into the pile of black crystals, only to collide face-first with the chitin-armoured chest of another youma who had been diving for the mana shards.

Crystals went flying every way as more youma landed on top of the two as they jumped at the pile of delicious food. The smarter ones stayed on the side lines to scavenge whatever shards were kicked and flung their way.

As Torian's roaring laughter echoed through the library, Ami hung her head and watched the chaos. Well, at least this proved that the crystal's control didn't linger.

Duke Libasheshtan sat at his desk, a quill in his hand as he concentrated on his penmanship.

Cathy's voice came from the direction of the door to his office. "Just another dwarf without a minion link setting off an alarm trap, nothing to worry about."

The Duke grunted an acknowledgement, not taking his eyes off his work. The occasional false alerts were annoying, but Mercury considered infiltration, poison, and sabotage the greatest credible danger to Salthalls. It was an assessment he agreed with.

The ink in his inkwell vibrated from Cathy's footstep as she approached. "Isn't Mercury here to help with the planning?" she asked, casting a shadow over his work as she peered down at the immaculately drawn characters.

The Duke snorted. "I hardly need her assistance to give orders to my own people." He placed a final dot, and, satisfied, finally looked up at the human woman, only to boggle in surprise. His eyes widened as he took in her form-hugging leather outfit that wouldn't have looked too out of place on one of those horrible dark mistresses the empress employed.

Cathy tilted her head to the side upon seeing his raised eyebrows. "What's with that reaction? It doesn't even show any skin."

"But- no, that's not it," the Duke said, blinking. "I could have sworn you were wearing armour."

"Right, dwarven senses," Cathy muttered to herself. She clapped her hands, producing a metallic clang before they touched each other. "I am," she explained. "I just had a warlock turn it invisible for aesthetical reasons," she explained, sounding irritated. "Not a bad solution, but I keep accidentally bumping into things I thought I was clear of."

"The effect is rather unpleasant, Commander," the Duke said, "I recommend you not to use it around dwarfs."

"Noted," Cathy said. "So where is Mercury?"

"She mentioned something about revisiting an old experiment."

"… and then I realised that I don't actually need a completely sealed, hollow adamantine container," Ami told Snyder as she excitedly gesticulated with the glass tube she held in her left hand. The noise of her lab coat swishing echoed faintly in the bare, white-tiled lab that she had designed to be easy to clean, not unlike a modern bathroom.

The red-haired acolyte standing behind a stainless steel pedestal looked up from the notes before him, his pale face betraying a certain lack of enthusiasm.

"Question," he said, interrupting her explanations. "Correct me if I am wrong, but this spell you are having me study," he met her eyes. "Isn't this the summoning spell with its safety features stripped out?"

"Yes, exactly," Ami nodded with a pleased smile.

"Oh dear. I was hoping I was mistaken," Snyder said, his eyes darting towards the exit from the lab. "I cannot conceive of any safe, let alone constructive application for summoning something into occupied space."

"Filtering," Ami replied.

The acolyte paused for a moment, raising his hand to his smooth chin before shaking his head. "How does flinging mashed-together bits at insane speeds in every direction make things less intermingled?"

Far from discouraged, Ami held the metal-capped glass tube closer for him to see. "We are going to teleport pure magical energy, so there's no need to worry about explosions," she said as she put one finger on the glass. "Watch, it passes right through solid objects."

To demonstrate, she pushed a bit of mana through the digit, producing a small glowing sphere attached to her fingertip that passed through the glass without resistance.

"I even made this container so I could pump all the air out first so that nothing but mana will be teleported," she continued.

Snyder pondered this for a moment. "Ah, well, that does sound like it could work," he said. "If there is no interaction between- wait a moment, what does this have to do with filtering? Don't tell me…" he looked up in alarm, his gaze wandering to the only table in the room.

An anvil-like block of stone covered in white tiles protruded from the ground, topped by a metal plate. From its centre rose a light blue hilt like a tiny flagpole, the rest of the dagger buried deep within the thick steel.

"And suddenly, I am worried again," Snyder said. He started massaging his temples. "That's an adamantine weapon, isn't it?"

Ami simply nodded.

"Of course it is. Naturally, you want to teleport something that can pass through solid matter safely into the one thing it cannot. Why am I even surprised?"

"That isn't entirely correct," Ami said, her confidence audible in her voice. "In the absence of wards, uncontaminated mana will pass through adamantine easily enough."

"Meaning yours won't," the acolyte pointed out immediately.

"Which is why it will be filtered if it's teleported inside," Ami replied. "With the adamantine being indestructible, the contaminants will either get crushed into some harmless form or just stay stuck inside, leaving only uncontaminated mana to trickle out."

Snyder sighed and walked around the table, eyeing the steel keeping the dagger in place critically. "I don't know. Are you absolutely sure this is not going to end with an indestructible dagger being hurled in a random direction at speeds that would make lightning seem slow?"

"Yes, Snyder. You wouldn't be here if I hadn't already run a few tests myself," Ami said as she placed the glass tube onto a circular depression on the table. It locked into place with an audible click. "Nothing bad or violent happened using either mana, pure dark energy, or life energy."

The acolyte relaxed. "Oh, yes, that makes sense. You are obviously able to cast the spell yourself, possibly even at safe range." Now looking more interested, he approached within touching range of the dagger. "So what happened?"

"In order, the experiments produced mana, mana, and life energy," she reported. "I was a little worried about the adamantine gobbling up the latter, but apparently, it doesn't do that unless activated first."

"That sounds like it is working according to your predictions," he said, looking over at her questioningly. "So why are we both here-oh. Oh no."

Ami had just transported an unconscious chicken into the room and was holding it in her arms. While she had expected Snyder's reluctance, the whine in his voice that implied she had failed to learn from previous experience still felt a little irritating.

"I remember that experiment," the acolyte said, backing away from the table, "and I have no desire to end up covered in chicken guts again!"

"That only happened after we tried to heal the chicken with synthetic holy power," she protested, running her fingers gently over the sleeping bird's feathers. "You are only here to evaluate the results and to figure out a warding scheme for collecting the filtered energy."

"I see. You need someone who can make it work without interfering with the summoning spell," Snyder said with a nod.

"Yes, but in a first step, I'll need you to just cast the spell. I'll be too busy manipulating the life energy to do it myself. Don't worry, with both circle and distance being so tiny, it won't tax you much." Ami petted the chicken once again before cancelling her possession spell.

In a streak of darkness, she popped up next to her glamoured golem twin. Though they both wore identical lab coats, nobody would confuse them standing side by side. Ami's eyes were glowing red while the golem's had reverted to aquamarine, and the chicken remained firmly in the animated statue's grasp.

Ami plunged her index finger into the animal's feather coat, touching skin, and cautiously drained a harmless amount of life energy. With the white glow trailing her digit like a misty thread, she touched it to the glass of her vacuum tube and pushed the faint wisp inside.

Snyder shot her a bemused look, glancing first at her and then at the golem.

"I only have enough control for this in my original body, especially when working through glass," Ami explained even as her visor expanded out over her eyes. The golems' ice just didn't conduct Metallia's dark energy with enough precision for the complicated fine manipulation needed to weave life energy into off-brand holy power.

"Very well." The redhead watched intently as Ami placed her hands left and right of the standing tube. Threads of black lightning darted from her fingertips into the mote of life energy floating within the container, dragging the glowing sphere into its centre. "I only have to get the ball, correct?"

"Yes," Ami confirmed. "You can start already; I should be finished before you."

The acolyte got to work, carefully evaluating the distance between the light energy and the dagger stuck in the table. As he started chanting, tiny counter-rotating circles of flame appeared around the weapon's thickest part, a section of the grip near the crossguard. Matching circles appeared within the glass tube, burning brightly despite the lack of air.

Ami only spared them enough attention to verify that their positions were correct before concentrating fully on her own part of the work. She felt a bead of sweat run down her forehead as she concentrated on twisting the energies into the right patterns. She doubted she would have managed to produce the delicate, complex structures required without the dungeon heart aiding with stabilisation, control, and memorisation. Perhaps some of the dwarfs might be able to do it though, given the intricateness of the artwork she had seen. Oh no, don't get distracted now.

The minutes passed faster than Ami had expected, and she barely managed to finish before Snyder's voice rose to a crescendo. The spinning circles flared up a final time before they disappeared along with the sphere of synthetic light power at their centre. In an instant, the vacuum tube was completely empty, and a terrible sensation washed over Ami.

"Eeeep!"

Snyder flinched at the startled cry and looked up from the pulse of white light emanating from dagger. Spotting only the statue-still golem, he blinked at the empty spot where the blue-haired Keeper had just been standing, and then shrugged. "Success, I guess?"

Using Keeper transport to escape from danger was usually a great idea. Doing so on reflex, without a predetermined destination in mind, was considerably less so. As a Keeper, Ami couldn't keep herself stashed away in her own storage, after all.

She found herself at a new location, still staggering backwards from her leap away from the holy-infused dagger. Waving her arms to recover her balance, she caught a glimpse of Cathy's and Duke Libasheshtan's widening eyes as she stumbled past his desk. Oh, so she had appeared in his office – which was the last spot she had observed with her Keeper Sight, she quickly deduced.

Her back slammed into something hard before she could congratulate herself for learning something useful. She had run out of space and collided with a tall bookcase near the wall, which wobbled and buried her under an avalanche of books. A crystal chandelier above rang from the force of the impact.

"Mercury?" Cathy's voice called. The thick carpet muffled the clanging of her boots as she approached with rapid steps.

"Your Majesty?" Duke Libasheshtan reacted only a moment later, rising half from his seat to better peer over his desk.

"Ow," Ami complained, rubbing her head where a particularly heavy tome had struck her. She sat upright, causing some of the books to slide off her, and looked up. "I'm fine, just startled," she said and held a hand out for Cathy to grab unto.

With a deft pull, the swordswoman helped the teenager back on her feet.

The Duke blinked rapidly at Ami as he inspected her more closely. "You are actually here in the flesh, your Majesty!" he exclaimed before he let himself fall back into his seat with a heavy thud. Kneading his nose bridge between thumb and index finger, he added in a wry tone, "Should I take it as an indictment of my work as your Regent that you are trying to kill yourself barely a day after I took the job?"

Ami stopped straightening out her lab coat to look at him. "I wasn't actually doing anything dangerous. Unpleasant, yes," she didn't try to suppress the large smile that was forcing its way onto her face, "but that means it was a success! Yes!" She pumped her fist in the air with an elated hop.

The dwarf raised an eyebrow. "Enthusiasm aside, please be careful. It would be exceedingly awkward if I had to explain that you tripped and broke your neck shortly after becoming my ward. That said," his voice became less dry, "what were you doing that has you in such a good mood?"

"Creating artificial holy power using adamantine!" she answered clapping her hands.

The Duke's jaw dropped as he stared at her, at a loss for words.

"You actually got it to work this time?" Cathy asked with barely any hint of disbelief.

"Yes!" Ami clapped her hands together, barely able to contain her excitement. "We'll finally have enough power to break the curses on the blinded citizens' eyes! Or to brute-force heal transformed dwarfs when the slime method seems unsafe!" she cheered.

"That sounds amazing," Cathy said with a smile. "And it works just like that?"

Ami's elation faded a little. "Well, I may have skipped a few steps. The holy power needs to be captured and stored in batteries." She shook her head, thinking. "No, make it wands instead. They can be brought into light temples and directly handed to priests." She paused. "Oh, I should inform Abbot Durval that he can focus entirely on healing now."

"I'm sure he'll be so disappointed about no longer needing to handle that creepy dark energy gauntlet you made for him," Cathy commented.

The abbot's training with the Metallia-energy infused gauntlet was redundant now that Ami had a way to produce holy energy without the dungeon heart ruining it.

She inclined her head, touching her chin as she thought out aloud, "Actually, it might be worth investing some time into developing a spell that can automatically transform the life energy for me." Her own contributions were the bottleneck here, as she had to treat the life force personally with Metallia's power.

"It sounds like the only thing stopping you here is minor details, your Majesty, surprising as this may be considering the topic." The Duke shook his head in disbelief before settling on a neutral expression. "However, it's fortunate that you are here. In light of the upcoming gala, there is a topic I need to discuss with you."

Hearing the seriousness in the dwarf's voice, Ami turned to give him her full attention. "Yes?"

"As your Regent, I have no choice but to point out that your…" he slowed down as if thinking about his phrasing, "preferences… concerning your redecoration efforts and sense of style are highly, well, inappropriate." To illustrate his point, he held up an empty envelope made from high-quality parchment.

With a sinking feeling, Ami focused on the white and golden rectangle clearly meant for official correspondence. Given his opening words, she could already guess what the problem was before she spotted it.

Hair-thin golden threads emblazoned the envelope, gathering into denser geometric patterns at its four corners. Tightly layered and overlapping, they formed decorative but abstract angular patterns. At least they would have, without a number of minimal distortions to the intricate web. They tricked the eye into composing the image of two bat-shaped women without a stitch of clothing between them framing the centre of the envelope.

Ami felt a blush creep up her cheeks and hung her head. "I see, this-" a jolt of alarm went through her as the Duke's exact words sank in, and her blush intensified. "Wait, you think I'm doing this on purpose?!" she shouted, staring at him wide-eyed.

At her sudden outburst, the Duke retreated deeper into his chair and looked her in the eyes inquisitively. "You mean you are not?"

So embarrassing, but she had failed to inform him about the details of her dungeon's Corruption, hadn't she? With everything else that was going on, it had never crossed her mind…

Looking apologetic, the dwarf continued, "I thought you were at an age where humans-"

"NO!" At this point, Ami's ears felt so hot as if they were about to combust, and Cathy's snickering wasn't helping. "It's a side effect of preventing the dark gods from using my dungeon heart to kill us all!" she elaborated.

"That's not exactly reassuring," Duke Libasheshtan said. "I almost prefer my previous assumption, your Majesty."

"They can't do anything now," Ami hurriedly assured him. "I fixed the weakness in the dungeon heart's design. It worked through the Corruption it pumps into the environment. The problem is that the more I control one of the Corruption's aspects, the less control I have over others. To fix the issue, I had to permit cosmetic alterations within my dungeon." In a small voice she added, "Of which Salthalls is now a part."

The Duke hummed as he took in the information. "I see. So the more scandalous elements of your wardrobe are due to the influence of this Corruption?"

"Yes!" Ami confirmed, nodding rapidly.

"Actually, some cultural differences remain, your Grace," Cathy warned. "She sees absolutely nothing wrong with wearing skirts about this short." She brought her hand down to her thigh, indicating where the hem of Mercury's sailor skirt ended.

The Duke grimaced. "Cultural differences. Very well. On the bright side, that's still more modest than those fairy uniforms." He sighed. "Is there some way to mitigate or eliminate the effects of this Corruption? I can't bear thinking about what it will do to the ancient and priceless works of art in the city." His expression darkened. "Especially to the pieces with artistic nudity…"

Ami clasped her hands guiltily. "Well, dealing with it hasn't been a priority so far. I can think of some options, but they all have considerable drawbacks. For example, before the fighting started, I asked the dwarfs of Sirith Anlur to come up with acceptable designs that incorporate the Corruption's themes so it won't make further changes. I never heard back from them, though."

"Imagine that, with this war thing going on," Cathy deadpanned.

"You commissioned work from the exiles?" Duke Libasheshtan asked with sudden interest. "Intriguing. I will have to invite them to the gala. Still, that approach won't work for preserving the city."

"The other option is releasing control on the surface to impose harsher limits within the dungeon," Ami said. "However, that may render the surface uninhabitable."

"What kind of effects are we talking about?" The Duke asked.

Ami mentally estimated how much control she could maintain while still achieving her goals. "Inundations, lethal cold, crushing glaciers. Brittleness, decay, random magical effects. Insect plagues and poisonous, strangling thorn thickets," she listed. "All three themes supplemented by an undercurrent of generic evil."

Duke Libaheshtan was frowning when she finished. "… might be tolerable..." he muttered to himself.

Ami couldn't believe her ears. "Um, I think you might be underestimating the lethality of those effects."

The Duke gave her a grave look. "Your Majesty, I believe you may be underestimating how much value we dwarfs put on protecting our irreplaceable historical treasures."

"But-"

"Consider the structures on the surface expendable," the Duke instructed. "Once you do, how much can you limit the collateral damage?"

Ami blinked. She didn't have a scenario ready that just gave up on the surface buildings, but once she permitted herself to consider that option, a new possibility presented itself. "Oh! I can cycle the effects!" she exclaimed. "Start with the rampant growth, kill it off with frost, then switch back," she said. "This way, the effects can't build up and spread into the surrounding regions."

Duke Libasheshtan nodded with grim acceptance. "Do it. That should tide us over until you come up with a better solution, or at least long enough to get the gala over while avoiding complete mortification."

Last edited: May 8, 2020

Fairy Audience

The ice and snow coating Salthalls glittered in the sun. Strong winds whipped clouds of mist past empty buildings and shook the withered thorn vines crawling across facades and roofs. Icicles dangled from one of the dead plants arching across the road, making it look like the upper jaw of an ancient predator. Its icy fangs quivered, not from the wind, but from the trembling of the ground as a large shadow blotted out the sun.

With loud shattering noises, something shaped like a huge maggot brushed the frozen vines aside as if they were mere spider webs. Metre-long spines protruded from its barky segments, reaching even the frozen vegetation connecting the roofs and tearing through them in a hail of broken icicles and plant matter. The being slowly inched forward and completely ignored the bombardment. Not even sharp-edged fragments tumbling into the gaps between its stiff segments and reaching the silk-like webbing underneath could catch its attention.

Two pinpricks of red light shone behind a tall window of one of the buildings burrowed half into the mountainside. Ami's breath condensed on the cold glass in front of her as she watched the crawling creatures scraping wide trails through the snow. She turned towards the room's second window, where seven insect-winged girls were huddled together.

Three of the fairies were leaning shoulder to shoulder on the windowsill, their faces so close to the glass that it was fogging up. Three more peered over them, also trying to get a good look at the wintery landscape. The final one had her hands on her sisters' backs to push herself up, rapidly beating her wings to lighten the load. Her hovering caused a strong breeze in the already uncomfortably cold chamber.

Ami cleared her throat to catch their attention.

Dandel, the eldest of the fairies, reacted first. The indigo-haired girl straightened and turned towards Ami. This caused Roselle's hand on her back to slip. The orange-eyed sister lost her balance, and her steady hover turned into an involuntary dive even as the buzzing of her wings intensified. With a startled yelp, she bumped into the small group of girls.

Some jostling, a chorus of startled noises, and an indignant screech when a cheek made contact with the cold glass later, all of the fairy sisters had noticed Ami looking at them and turned to face her.

She gestured towards the various couches and armchairs arranged around the room's fireplace in a wordless invitation, claiming a high-backed seat with red upholstery for herself.

Camilla, as the official Ambassador, sat down separate from the others in an armchair directly across the low coffee table from Ami. Roselle and Tilia picked the couch to the blonde's left, close to the fireplace. Dandel, Anise and Melissa took the couch on her right. Cerasse ended up in the armchair furthest away and brushed away a few specks of dust that had gathered there since the dwarfs had abandoned the surface.

"As you can see," Ami said, inclining her head towards the windows, "I have good reasons for delaying the construction of your new embassy."

Cerasse abruptly stopped her cleaning efforts and looked up. "What exactly are those creepy things?" She asked curiously. A moment later, her purple eyes widened in alarm and she quickly tacked on the "Your Imperial Majesty" she had forgotten.

"You don't have to worry about addressing me formally while it's only us here," Ami reassured her with a gentle smile. In truth, she still hadn't gotten entirely used to being treated like an Empress. For a moment, she wondered how many people would only talk to her painstakingly according to protocol out of spite if they knew it made her feel a little awkward. "As for your question, they are hives. Colonies of venomous bugs taking shelter in the frozen remnants of cacti."

The redhead wedged between Dandel and Melissa glanced at the amulet placed among the plates with snacks on the table. As it remained dark, there were no people scrying on them. Without hesitation, Anise took advantage of the absence of potential lip readers to accept Ami's offer and speak freely. "What in the world made you think it was a good idea to let those overgrown pincushions loose in the city?"

Ami scratched the back of her head. "Ah, that was unintentional. They are an undesired side effect of rerouting my dungeon's Corruption to the surface. Periodically cycling through different modes was supposed to make the different effects counter each other."

Dandel tilted her head to the side. "How does this lead to shambling plant husks, your Majesty?"

"A little overlooked problem," Ami admitted, her cheeks flushing lightly. "The cold part of the cycle was supposed to kill off the lifeforms generated by the hyper-fertility part, but then the river started freezing up and threatened to turn into a dam. I had to make some quick adjustments to exclude it, which unfortunately allowed some of the bugs to find shelter and adapt."

The fairies stared at her in silence, various expressions flitting over their faces. Cerasse raised a sceptical eyebrow, Melissa was blinking rapidly, and Anise narrowed her eyes in annoyance.

"… don't want to be pumped full of Corruption," Roselle muttered as she scanned the corners of the room for suspicious alterations.

"Right. Rerouting Corruption to the surface," Camilla said after a moment. "But, why? Why would you even do something like that?"

"To protect the rest of the city," Ami answered. "The idea is giving the Corruption an outlet so it stops enforcing its more, um, embarrassing themes elsewhere."

Tilia snorted. The emerald-haired fairy sat with her legs folded, demonstratively staring at Ami's short skirt through half-lidded eyes. "As if you would mind."

Ami felt the blood rush to her cheeks at the reminder of her undeserved reputation. She wringed her hands for a moment as she suppressed her first reaction and swallowed her protests. Arguing the point right now just was unlikely to change their minds. Instead, she let out a long breath. "Most of the people who live in the city do. They aren't as comfortable with suggestive outfits as you are."

"What's that supposed to mean?" Melissa growled, an uncharacteristic look of indignation on the usually placid fairy's face.

The fairies were wearing their white uniforms, which blurred the line between a one-piece swimsuit and a bikini. They covered even less than Ami's Sailor Mercury uniform and were, in her opinion, just a simple colour switch removed from looking like typical Underworld wear. With as little insulation as their clothing provided, the sisters had to be using some magic to keep warm.

"I mean that lots of people here have a low tolerance for bare skin," Ami clarified in order not to needlessly antagonise the fairies. She had a small request for them, after all. "In any case, I was hoping that you could contact your superiors to notify them about the current difficulties with constructing the embassy on the surface. If it's acceptable to them, the plans can be altered to build it underground instead."

Camilla briefly glanced at her sisters, but they were leaving the answer up to the actual ambassador. After a moment, she inclined her head in a nod. "That sounds reasonable."

She didn't sound very enthusiastic, and Melissa and Roselle showed slightly bitter expressions. The others were keeping their faces carefully neutral, but their postures shifted slightly as they tensed up.

It was clear to Ami that they weren't eager to report that except for Tilia, they had all formed minion links. Sure, it hadn't been voluntary, and Ami had severed them as soon as the sisters were able to think clearly again, but that wouldn't shield them from the repercussions. She had better distract them from their justified resentment for ruining their careers with something more pleasant, she thought guiltily.

"Good. In the meantime, you have free choice of accommodations. You may opt to stay with the civilians, move into the quarter reserved for the cured dwarfs, or into a temple," she listed. "If you don't like any of those options, you can also pick any building in the city. Just let me know first so I can keep the insane dwarfs away. Finally, if you prefer, I can also construct you a temporary home to your specifications."

"I believe a shrine would-"

"Can we have a heated pool?"

Dandel and Melissa, who had started speaking at the same time, stopped to look at each other.

"I don't mind if you discuss your options among each other first," Ami said.

Cerasse looked thoughtful. "I don't know, doesn't this feel a little like a bribe?" she pondered.

Dandel's pupils contracted, and she shot the purple-haired girl a look that all but screamed, "Don't say things like that out loud!"

Ami had to admit that Cerasse's suspicion wasn't entirely off the mark. While she genuinely wanted to recompense them for the hardships they had suffered, she also needed them in a cooperative mood. "You can always run your decision past your superiors first to avoid giving the wrong impression," she suggested quickly.

Camilla nodded. "That would be for the best if I'm contacting them anyway."

"Indeed." Ami hesitated for a moment before continuing with fake reluctance, "At the same time, you may as well ask for permission to attend a gala Duke Libasheshtan will be holding to celebrate his appointment as Regent of my Empire."

The blonde was about to nod before she froze, her eyes widening and her jaw dropping.

"Wait, what?" Roselle asked, sitting up straighter.

"Did you say 'Regent'?" Melissa asked, blinking.

"Are you serious?" Anise seemed the most incredulous of the lot.

Ami had to stop herself from giggling at their flabbergasted expressions. She was pretending to be annoyed about the devious dwarven plot, after all. In a flat voice, she answered, "It was the only way the dwarfs would agree to opening negotiations with me, even if it's over a middleman."

"And you are willing to go along with that, your Majesty?" Dandel asked curiously.

Well, yes. It was Ami's own plan, after all. Still, she did her best to sound grumpy as she answered, "Their laws don't really leave me a choice. It's either going along or forcing them to consider their citizens lost and hostile combatants, with all that entails."

Camilla gulped. "Yes, that would be horrible."

"So you want to avoid a fight," Tilia said. The somewhat smug twitch of her lips indicated that she was coming up with her own conclusions about Ami's motivations. "So why invite us? Wouldn't you want to keep such an embarrassing predicament secret?" At that point, she wasn't putting much effort into hiding her glee, which earned her a warning look from her eldest sister.

"Well, I'd prefer not to go along with all of this only for the dwarfs to back out of the deal as soon as it's convenient," Ami said. "The more public the proceedings, the greater the shame if they break the agreement. Thus, having an ambassador from the Shining Concord Empire attend will greatly reduce the chance of open hostilities resuming. Besides, your presence will reassure other diplomats that they have nothing to fear from me."

Anise jumped to her feet, her face red. "Nothing to fear? You turned us into monsters!" she yelled, pointing her finger accusingly at Ami.

Next to the redhead, Dandel twitched and bit her lips, and then urgently tugged on her sister's wing to try to get her to sit back down.

Ami shrank back in her seat. While the redhead posed only minimal danger to her, even considering her magic, being shouted at by someone with a justified grudge still made her uncomfortable. "That-that was a complete accident! I turned you back as soon as I had a cure!" she defended herself.

"Because you had already achieved your goal of turning us into your minions!" Anise countered. She winced when the tugging on her wing became painfully insistent. With a sideways glare at her indigo-haired sister, she let herself fall back down on the couch.

Ami shook her head. "But that doesn't make sense. If that had been my goal, then why would I have sent you to Salthalls, where I would have very little control over the situation? It would have been much more straightforward to just transform you at my dungeon."

"To serve as a distraction? Plausible deniability?" Cerasse speculated, earning herself a grateful nod from Anise.

Ami sighed. "No. What would I have to gain from making you form a link just to sever it again? Without even keeping it a secret?"

Neither Anise nor Cerasse had an immediate answer. In the sudden silence, Roselle muttered, "Now that's a question that's certain to keep me up at night."

"Well, it's evil," Melissa pointed out. "Keepers do evil things for no particular reason all the time."

Ami hesitated. That was a frustratingly simple argument that was nevertheless true and somewhat undermined her position. "Well, I don't!" she said lamely. "I wouldn't make more unnecessary trouble for myself by causing you harm on purpose. That would be completely pointless and counter-productive!"

Melissa frowned. "Still turned us into minions and ruined our future," she said and turned her head aside with a resentful sniff.

Ami averted her gaze from the dark looks the seven sisters sent in her direction. "And I'm really extremely sorry about that," she said quickly. "I will be offering restitution as soon as I can make sure it won't be interpreted as bribery or cause you further complications," she added. In a firmer voice, she clarified, "It was still an accident, though!"

Tilia uncrossed her arms and straightened her spine so she could deliberately look outside. "You do seem rather accident-prone. Sounds like it's a good thing you will be getting some adult oversight soon, doesn't it?"

Dandel clapped her hands. With a strained smile, she said, "I believe it might be best to return to the topic of the gala, your Majesty."

Ami relaxed her grip on her armrest and smiled gratefully. "Ah, yes. As I said, it would be most convenient if you brought it up with your superiors along with the possible blueprint change and the issue of your interim lodgings. You probably want to avoid giving the impression that you were doing me a favour."

Anise, with her arms crossed, immediately interjected, "Which it would be. Camilla, I'm not sure we should be doing her a favour."

Ami narrowed her eyes. "It's a favour to everyone currently living at Salthalls, as it will help keep them alive. Avoiding further combat is in everyone's best interest." She turned her head to address Cammilla directly. "Besides, isn't meeting important people part of your job as an Ambassador anyway?"

"That's true," Camilla admitted.

Tilia leaned forward. "Wait a moment, important people? Nobody important is going to risk entering a dungeon, right? Especially after what happened!"

"Actually, that won't be a problem," Ami said. "Duke Libasheshtan isn't holding the gala here, but at one of his other holdings." With a theatrical wave of her hand meant to avoid startling the fairies, she transported a map into the room.

The roll floated towards them in mid-air before slowly unrolling. It drifted down until it hovered a hand's width above the mostly untouched snacks.

"There," Ami said as she pointed at a location south of Salthalls with a hovering fork. "Fortress Nailcastle."

The fairies farthest away got up to get a closer look.

"Nailcastle?" Roselle said, frowning worriedly. "I can't think of a single way in which that name inspires confidence."

"The rock spire that the castle is built into is called 'the Nail', since it's tall and pointy," Ami explained.

Cerasse took a step forward and studied the map, her eyes darting back and forth between the different settlements. "Well, I can't fault the dwarfs for not expending much creativity on naming that place. It looks like a complete backwater."

"Makes sense," Anise nodded. Raising her hand to hide her mouth, she stage whispered, "Wouldn't want to invite her anywhere important," and promptly earned herself a reprimanding kick to her ankle from Dandel.

Ami pretended not to have heard the redhead's comment. "Nailcastle is the Duke's outpost farthest from Salthalls that still has a suitable ballroom and a hero gate. As for guests, well, the Avatar will be attending. Perhaps you could convince him to put in a good word for you with your superiors?"

The fairies sat up straighter.

"The Avatar?" Roselle's orange eyes gleamed.

Cerasse nodded after a moment of thought. "It makes sense he would want to be there to keep an eye on things."

"It certainly sounds like an opportunity…" Dandel considered, sounding as if she was still trying to find fault with Ami's suggestion.

As the sisters started chattering among themselves, Melissa addressed Ami: "Empress Mercury, will General Jadeite be attending the gala too?"

Camilla closed her eyes and let out an exasperated sigh.

Ami felt a flicker of irritation. "Unfortunately, his presence here at Salthalls remains necessary for sustaining the eyesight-restoring glamour on the cursed civilians, I'm sorry to say." She wasn't feeling very sorry at all.

Melissa's face fell briefly before lighting up again. "Right, I can just find him here instead."

"There won't be any shortage of interesting people to meet at the gala," Ami said. "Aside from dwarfs, there will also be human and elven delegations."

"Sounds fun," Roselle commented. "Will there be good food and music?"

Ami nodded in confirmation.

"Well, I'm game. It will be great to get some proper daylight again."

"I wouldn't want to miss it either," Anise said. She was facing her sisters, but watching Ami from the corners of her eyes. "Empress Mercury having to accept an appointed regent! You can't get that kind of entertainment elsewhere!"

Camilla quickly cleared her throat. "Ahem. Right. I'll see what I can do to properly represent the Shining Concord Empire at this memorable occasion, your Majesty!"

"Good." Ami nodded and got to her feet to signal that the audience was over. "Duke Libasheshtan is in charge of the preparations. Contact him if you require an appropriate wardrobe or other supplies."

Following her example, the fairies stood and made various polite noises of gratitude as they bowed. Dandel's bow was the deepest, while Anise's was barely more than a nod.

As the group was taking the first steps toward the door, Ami called out, "Oh, Anise? Stay for a moment, please."

The redhead froze, blood draining from her face. She slowly turned back to Ami, a light sheen of sweat on her forehead as she was apparently starting to regret her confrontational attitude.

Her sisters stopped too and watched with concerned expressions. Dandel in particular looked ready to step protectively in front of her ruby-eyed sister.

Ami wasn't petty enough to let the group worry just because one of them had been a little aggressive. Quickly, she raised her left hand, palm facing the ceiling, and reached into her Keeper storage. A clear, elongated crystal filled with complex glowing conduits appeared floating above her palm. "Do you recognise this?"

Anise's eyes widened in surprise, even as some tension faded from her body. Her right hand rose as if she wanted to reach for the gem, only to change direction after a moment as she crossed her arms.

"Do you still remember where you got it from?" Ami asked even as she moved the crystal a little farther away.

The healed transformation victims generally kept their memories of the experience, which included the knowledge of how to perform magical techniques they had access to as a youma. Granted, most of them were unusable without the matching body, but it would be relatively simple for a talented mage to derive a functional spell from knowledge of the incomplete ability.

Ami was understandably wary about someone being able to create crystals that could control her troops.

"Yes," Anise admitted. "I found it in a crate full of gems."

Ami breathed a little easier. The thing being some kind of dwarven treasure was preferable to it being potentially mass-producible. "Where?"

The fairy tilted her head to the side. "Your treasury, obviously. Where else would one of your command tokens be?" After a moment, her pupils shrunk in sudden realisation. "I didn't mug anyone for it!" she said, raising her hands defensively.

"A command token?" Ami asked, somewhat distracted by the question of how something from Salthalls could have ended up inside one of her sapphire crates.

Anise shrugged her shoulders. "Well, I don't know your name for it, but that's what I call it. Since it's used to command your minions."

"I see." If anything, Ami had more questions than before, and her eyes narrowed. "What makes you so certain it's one of mine?"

Anise shot her an incredulous look. "Well, what else am I supposed to think when it's in your treasury, in a crate with your emblem on it, works on your minions, and has your shadow inside?"

"It has what now?" Ami blinked wide-eyed at the crystal that had just skipped ahead in her priority queue.

Last edited: Aug 28, 2020

Crystal Investigation

A dungeon heart's standard library pattern included the expected bookshelves, lecterns, and reading tables. However, it also came with test tubes, alembics and similar research equipment. This didn't sit well with Ami, who doubted the wisdom of having experimenting warlocks and flammable books together in the same room. Therefore, she had split her library into a reading area and a separate laboratory built from fireproof stone. It turned out to be a prudent decision.

Thick clouds of grey steam billowed out of the crystal she had taken from Anise, rapidly filling the chamber behind the sturdy observation window.

Ami's eyes widened, and she stopped mid-typing to whip her head around and stare at the bald warlock assisting her. "What did you do, Harold?" she shouted in alarm.

The researcher seemed to shrink under her stare as if trying to hide behind the row of differently sized crystal balls on his workbench. Little beads of sweat appeared on his bald and tattooed scalp, glittering purplish in the light emanating from under her visor. "I w-w-was just c-calibrating the m-magnification, your Majesty, I swear!" he replied, tapping his finger against one of the spheres.

She redirected her gaze to the device that, contrary to her expectation, wasn't showing a close up-image of the circuitry within the gem.

Harold gulped as he realised what it looked like. "It's not off, it's just dark!" he blurted out. "In fact, it's stuck! There has to be some kind of warding on the thing!"

A functional ward against scrying? Normally, Ami would be salivating at the thought of studying it. Unfortunately, saving it from going up in flames took priority. She quickly zoomed in on the smoking gem with her Keeper sight, bypassing the steam and the glass that was fogging up.

So far, the crystal seemed intact, but it was sliding back and forth violently. Keeping the gem on a small dish floating in a water-filled bucket had seemed like a fine idea to keep it from touching her dungeon directly, at least before the water had started boiling inexplicably.

A trio of particularly large rising bubbles struck the floating dish at the same time, causing it to capsize. With a quiet splash, the gem sunk to the bottom.

Its motion reduced the precision of the readings from Ami's visor, which had just started to become interesting. She had detected traces of an invisibility spell coming from inside the crystal, which would certainly explain why she hadn't yet found any sign of the shadow Anise had described.

Did she need to interfere, or should she keep analysing what was going on with her visor? So far, the crystal didn't seem to be taking any damage. The twisted little pathways in its interior seemed to be vibrating at a high frequency, but they weren't generating any heat directly.

Infra-red indicated that the water was heating up fairly uniformly, which indicated-

It was hard to think. Huh, why she was on the floor? Had she been taking a nap? She felt like she could drift off back to sleep any moment.

Her visor flashed lines in an irritating red colour at her.

She blinked. Red was bad, wasn't it? Scrunching up her forehead, she tried to make sense of the symbols before her. That one over there was a seven, she was pretty sure. Wait, why was she having trouble with this?

The sudden spike of alarm cleared some of the haze from her mind. Her desire for wakefulness clashed with a pressure trying to lull her back to sleep, its concealment broken by directly opposing her will.

There was an intruder in her head! Startled, she started paying close attention to her thoughts, trying to separate her own mental processes from foreign ones.

The spell numbing her thoughts was now dealing with a target too agitated to go to sleep even if she wanted to, expended the last of its power, and faded away. In response, the foreign presence in her mind gave up on subtlety. An impression of cold fury, screaming skulls, and a burning crown radiated outwards from it.

Ami froze in horror. How could Crowned Death be here?

The giant skull composed of black fire and more skulls barrelled towards her like a tsunami, howling with bloodlust.

Impossible. While Ami wasn't completely certain that the dark god couldn't get into her head somehow, she knew that he wouldn't need to bother with petty tricks like trying to get her to fall asleep. She was dealing with one of his underlings trying to possess her.

The corners of her lips quirked upwards. In a battle of pure magical power, she was confident that she could outlast her attacker.

Her perspective shifted. The wall of fire and skulls that had been about to fill her entire mindscape retreated and shrunk as her own mental representation grew. The distance between her and the intruder expanded at the same rate as her own size increased, and she decided that there should be gravity, and a floor.

The enemy's advance turned into a lunge that fell way short of its target. The intruder flopped to the ground with a wet smack, sending skulls and flames bouncing in every direction. A prone spectral figure in black robes decorated with chains remained behind.

Ami crouched down and reached for the surprised spectre before it could recover.

Pinned between her thumb and index finger, the thing squirmed like a caterpillar, unable to move either digit even a little. Neither was it able to ignore physics and obstacles as it did in the real world.

Ami frowned. Without a doubt, this was the spectre who had once controlled many aquatic undead and who had gotten loose when she got trapped in the adamantine box. Why was it here now, and what did it have to do with the crystal she had been investigating? Speaking of which, she really should check what was going on with that, too.

"-Majesty? Are you all right, your Majesty?" Harold's voice came from his corner of the room. The warlock was at the side of his workbench, looking undecided on whether he should rush to her aid or flee the room.

"I'll be fine," she commented, focusing on her visor. The crystal was no longer producing heat, but there, in red, she saw the outline of a root-like underground tendril connecting the six-sided gem with her left foot.

Apparently, the spectre had sprung an ambush from within the gem, phasing through the solid matter underneath the floor to sneak up on her.

Well, that neatly explained what exactly Anise had seen inside the crystal. Still, Ami wasn't satisfied. The spectre shouldn't have been sapient, let alone smart enough to use tricks and deception. She wanted answers, and she could extract some from the creature currently trapped by her will if she dared to seize them.

A part of her balked at the idea. Sifting through Keeper Malleus' memories had been bad enough. Diving into the mind of a creature that may or may not be a tiny fragment of a dark god had the potential to be much, much worse.

Thinking on the issue for a bit, she decided that she should be fine if she took precautions. She would start with its most recent memories and slowly go backwards in time. The being hadn't been able to commit any atrocities while stuck in her dungeon, after all.

She checked up on the state of her prisoner once more. The spectre was trapped in the same condition as it had intended for her to end up in, unable to think under the pressure she was exerting on its mind and effectively comatose. Safe enough, but she wasn't going to take any risks. One imagined rubber band wrapped around her fingers later, the spectre would get squished the moment she lost concentration.

Satisfied with her precautions, she forced her way into the being's memories.

A strange, distorted view of squished-together shapes and odd colours appeared before her. The spectre didn't see like living things did, but relied on magical senses that were closer to Keeper sight.

Disoriented, Ami hesitated for a moment as she learned to make sense of what she was seeing. It didn't take her long to figure out the colours didn't match the visual spectrum and that the spectre had 360-degree vision, which was annoying, but not incomprehensible. At least it was perceiving the world through something like magical radar or echolocation and not something that the next Incarnation of Extinction she ran into could use to kill everything around it.

Her prisoner's intentions, on the other hand, were straightforward and easy to interpret. This attack had been a premature assassination attempt. Fearing discovery, the spectre had been forced to act before its preparations were complete. The plan was to knock Ami out, take enough control to make her drop her possession spell, and then inflict a fatal wound on her body. Its success chances had been minimal from the start, given the power disparity, but minimal was still better than non-existent from not acting at all.

The spectre's original plan had been both simpler and more dangerous at once. It was going to gather enough magical power to force a possession without bothering with fighting for control, and then explode once within her true body.

Ami grimaced at the thought. That kind of attack could have worked on her if it caught her by surprise, as it targeted her, rather than the body she was possessing. Now she knew why the creature had tricked Anise into collecting dark magic crystals, too. It could drain power from them, though it took some time digesting it. Why did it pick the fairy, anyway?

Ami jumped a little farther through the spectre's memories, catching short glimpses each time. Most of it was the simple drudgery of lying below a pile of black shards and slowly extracting magical power from them. The treasury's occupants changed with each glimpse. Occasionally, the gem housing the spectre got picked up by Anise to establish control over yet another underling.

Ami paid particularly close attention to that process. According to the being's thoughts, it could have seeded pieces of itself within their bodies, similar to how it controlled and animated corpses. In this case, however, it deemed such an approach more prone to detection and wasteful to boot, as illusions of the Keeper giving orders worked just as well. It could even trick the transformed fairy into casting the spells herself without realising it to preserve more mana.

Ami paused. Trickery, deceit and illusions were not what she would have expected from an undead minion of Crowned Death. Subtlety just didn't seem like his usual modus operandi. Of course, that also gave him the advantage of surprise if he employed it sparingly. Still, she wouldn't have believed the spectre to be able of more than instinctive action after it lost so many of its component undead. Putting such a plan together and executing it should have been completely beyond it. She also hadn't figured out yet why it opted to work through the crystal, or why it was hiding inside in the first place.

One of the memories she checked actually showed her the spectre drawing Anise's attention to the gem crate. The being didn't know who she was, but her magic showed up brighter in its strange vision. This seemed to signify to the monster that she would be compatible with – yikes. Ami really didn't need to know a spell-boosting method that consumed the caster as fuel. Without delving into its details, she checked back further in time.

The crystal stuck inside of a gem crate. Irrelevant.

Inside of the same shaking crate on a train. Still irrelevant.

Suddenly having a monochrome viewpoint that more resembled normal vision, accompanied by impulses she'd expect from a very murderous instinct-guided animal? That was very interesting, and possibly too far back.

Ami considered the memory. This was back at her now abandoned dungeon, even though it was a bit hard to recognise with the spectre's vision somehow being able to see through walls. Its simplistic thought processes matched what she would have expected from the undead minion more closely. The main difference between its sapient and its animalistic state was the gem, which it had apparently found in her dungeon.

She examined more memories, going slightly forward in time, until she found one that caught her attention.

The spectre moved through her dungeon, unbound, moving towards a glow that stood out strongly to its magical senses and enraged it. Something was calling out, lighting up like a beacon, and the spectre would stop at nothing to destroy this rival.

The ethereal thing ghosted through several walls until it ended up in a sapphire-filled treasure chamber. Among the monochrome field of jewels, one crystal glowed bright blue in the spectre's vision. From each facet, a flailing tendril extended, reaching and grasping blindly.

To Ami, the crystal resembled some strange, injured sea creature. The tendrils looked as if they had been longer originally and something had torn them off.

The spectre reacted like a predator spotting a wounded prey animal and pounced, going right for the frayed end of one of the tendrils. Grasping the appendage with both hands, it started sucking nourishment from the wound.

The gem reacted to the assault by trying to stab its remaining tendrils into its attacker.

From the spectre's memories, Ami could tell that those attacks actually inflicted damage on it, unlike her own futile efforts to hurt it directly. The fight itself was something of a chaotic mess, as the creature didn't really remember the details clearly. It remembered aggression and wills clashing, pain, ripping and tearing, and pitting magical power against each other as both creatures tried to subsume each other.

In the end, the spectre proved itself a little stronger than its opponent and crushed the gem-creature's will, turning it into an empty husk. As the survivor possessed the crystal's inert corpse, its thoughts achieved clarity, rising above mere animal instinct.

The crystal seemed to provide as much mental capacity as an entire horde of animal zombies, which Ami found rather concerning. At least now, she knew why the spectre had been more capable than she expected. There was more, though. She got a first-person perspective of how the undead creature digested its gains. Its memories were back to the odd mode of vision in the first memory she had accessed – which seemed to be that of the crystal.

In an uncomfortable parallel to what Ami was doing right now, the monster had been looking at the memories of its victim. She got to observe them twice removed, which felt a little odd. Somehow like watching someone's memories of watching a TV show. If said TV was for magical senses humans didn't have. The spectre seemed to be rather bad at using the gem's senses, since the crystal's own memories were clearer and more vivid-looking. Most of them, however, were from the familiar perspective of an imp.

Ami was running into a little trouble finding what she wanted, as the spectre hadn't accessed the crystal's knowledge in chronological order. Between self-satisfied gloating to itself about beating a minion of the hated Unraveller – Ami took note of the gem's origin – and a hunger for more, it had mostly been interested in locating more victims.

She did catch some useful glimpses, not that the spectre agreed. There were foreign imps in her gem furnace room, each one with a crystal just like the one she was investigating embedded in the forehead. A network of straight lines connected each of these gems with each other, visible as a transparent overlay to the imp's vision.

The picture of said workers disassembling one of her gem furnaces in a coordinated effort worried her, but when she saw that they spent as much time and effort on the useless distractions as on the real mechanisms, she relaxed. It was clear that they didn't understand enough to know what was important.

She was more interested in their leader, the clearly Keeper-possessed dark mistress. Unfortunately, the spectre hadn't been, so it didn't pay much attention to her. Ami got a few glimpses of the intruder walking off towards her treasury, and that was it.

The spectre had been much more interested in hungrily eyeing the imps swarming over her equipment, wondering if it could catch up to them.

Ami, in contrast, was fascinated by the eerie coordination of the imps as they took apart the gem furnace bit by bit, handing each other pieces and tools without ever communicating or even looking at each other. Was that how the Unraveller of Mysteries got her name? It certainly looked as if the minions managed to take everything without inflicting damage, and she doubted they would have trouble piecing it back together again.

They didn't have an instruction manual, she reassured herself. Without knowing the right temperature range, the furnace wouldn't produce sapphires.

She skimmed through more memories, trying to get a better look at the dark mistress so she could identify the intruding Keeper.

Working imps, more working imps, more hungry gazing at forehead gems…

She paused as the imp the crystal was personally controlling licked the ashes in the growth cavity. According to the crystal's memories, it was analysing its composition. To Ami's alarm, it got surprisingly accurate results. She briefly wondered about imps being forced to eat all kinds of weird and harmful things just so the gem could recognise the taste. Did the intruders have similar ways to determine temperature and duration?

Questions for later. Where did the thieves come from? There were no memories to find before their arrival at Ami's dungeon. Apparently, the imps had been created on-site by the Keeper, using the possessed dark mistress as a piece of claimed ground. The crystal's earliest memory was a literal headache from being stabbed into an imp's head without any kind of anaesthetics. A dead end for her investigation.

Also, her speculation about the imps ingesting harmful substances in the name of chemistry had apparently been wrong. Fortunately, the gem furnaces had already cooled down from their operating temperature before the imps got here. At this point, she wouldn't be surprised if the crystals could get an accurate read on temperature by the painful burns they inflicted too. That sounded like a technique the dark gods would enjoy.

For a moment, she considered what kind of burns an imp would suffer from touching an active gem furnace before dismissing the unproductive thought. She still didn't know who had broken into her dungeon, aside from the fact that they had the Unraveller's support.

Her search continued. She saw a few scenes of the ice golem fighting the imps – the spectre found it amusing to watch something that looked like Keeper Mercury fail against the weakest kind of dungeon denizen that existed. She also saw the imp in which the captured gem was embedded die. The perspective shift from imp vision to crystal vision was rather jarring. It dropped into a deep, bent gap between two pieces of machines, sliding too far for the short arms of its allies to retrieve it. They could have managed to get it out eventually if they hadn't been retreating in a hurry, or if they had paid less attention to salvaging machinery.

Ami felt a renewed surge of worry. Was it possible they had retrieved enough of the furnace to figure out its operation? Normally, she would not think so, but with the Unraveller involved… Which phases would give a reverse engineer the most trouble? As she started mentally going through the steps, she hesitated.

Why did her mind keep circling back to the details of her gem furnace's inner workings when she was interested in tracking down the intruders? It wasn't relevant to her investigation at all.

Her eyes narrowed in suspicion. Was she being manipulated?

Of course not. There was obviously no subtle way to make her divulge that the correct temperature for the crystal forming process was-

Stop it!

A crystal-clear mental pulse that conveyed the message "It was worth a try" along with the equivalent of a shrug and a feeling of amused mockery answered her.

An instant later, the spectre radiated a feeling of mortal terror before abruptly disappearing from her mind.

Darn it! Ami suspected that the moment of animalistic fear had been her only genuine glimpse into the creature's mind, rather than at the carefully constructed façade that its puppet master had shown her. Expecting a renewed mental attack, she took an instant too long to focus her attention outward.

The crystal was slurping the elongated form of the spectre up like a noodle. According to Ami's visor, the ghostly being was now plain dead, rather than undead. The spiking energy levels in the gem also suggested that the process was fuelling a spell.

Without a flash or any other overt magical effects, a small sphere of matter just large enough to contain the gem disappeared. The surrounding water rushed in to fill the void and then spilled out through the circular hole in the bucket's bottom to fill the semi-spherical depression gouged out of the floor.

Ami doubted that the gem creature had simply committed an elaborate form of suicide. Typing frantically on her palmtop computer, she first checked if she wasn't dealing with some new form of trickery or illusion, and then confirmed traces of teleportation magic. She stomped her foot in frustration.

In the back, Harold silently tried to make himself smaller and less visible, trembling faintly. He froze when her gaze snapped onto him.

"Try to track that crystal, quickly," she ordered. There was a chance the thing hadn't gotten far with the power it had available. Its teleportation spell wasn't an innate ability, judging by its effects on the gem's environment, so it should be rather expensive to cast so quickly.

"At once, your Majesty!" The warlock almost toppled his crystal ball in his haste to touch it. "Seeking, seeking, I'm getting something, nearly - got it!" he shouted excitedly.

In an instant, Ami was right next to him and stared into the scrying device.

The gem was lying on the broken tip of a chalk-white stalagmite. It glittered in the single ray of sunlight that shone like a spotlight through a tiny gap in the cave's roof.

Ami didn't believe for an instant that the crystal had landed in the only illuminated spot by sheer good fortune. This was either an attempt to mislead her, outright mockery, or possibly both.

An imp stepped into the small circle of light and grabbed the gem.

On second thought, it might also have been a deliberate arrangement to make itself more visible to allies. Ami still wasn't willing to rule out the other possibilities though and grabbed a crystal ball of her own. "Keep a view of that location, they might be working with illusions," she instructed.

Meanwhile, the imp was bringing the pointy end of the gem up to his forehead with trembling arms.

Ami scried on the crystal herself and got a view of the same location as Harold. Unlike the warlock, she brought her perspective closer and closer to the gem, which earned her an unfortunate close-up view of the minion's face contorting in pain as he shoved the crystal slowly into his own forehead. Fighting through her revulsion, she zoomed in on the inside of the gem.

Her crystal ball went dark, which matched Harold's results earlier and confirmed she was looking at the real thing.

She discarded the temporary useless scrying device for another.

There was a flash of green from Harold's crystal ball, and the warlock bit back a curse. "It teleported!" He reported.

"Maintain view of the cave," Ami ordered. The place where the gem had first landed might be important, and once the crystal ball's point of view changed, it couldn't simply flip back to a previous one. With another scrying device in hand, she searched for the vanished gem herself.

The resulting image was an assault on the senses. A dizzying network of black and white lines completely covered the walls, forming patterns that seemed to wiggle in the corner of her eyes.

Ami blinked once and tore her gaze away from the strangely hypnotic sight, focusing entirely on the imp instead. Her face fell when she realised that he was standing at the edge of a rectangular basin where strange rainbow patterns played across the dark waters.

The imp stopped tapping his foot, looked up, and grinned in her direction. The gem set in his bloody forehead was blazing a bright white, growing in intensity when the imp waved at her.

With a loud clinking noise, cracks spread over Ami's crystal ball as if something heavy had struck its smooth surface.

Startled, she let go of the sphere, which shattered into pieces a moment later. She hurriedly picked up a replacement, but it refused to show anything but darkness.

Last edited: Dec 25, 2020

The Gala Begins

Snyder's palms glowed a gentle white as he pointed them at Ami.

She shuddered, clenching her teeth as the wave of purifying magic washed over her, and slid backwards with her chair as far as the armoured hands on her shoulders would let her.

Cathy shoved her back towards the redheaded acolyte with a little more enthusiasm than was strictly necessary. "So now we have to worry about a Keeper with unlimited gold on top of everything else?" the swordswoman asked, her exasperated voice tinged with a hint of fear.

"No, we have to worry about the Unraveller of Mysteries potentially figuring out at some point how my gem furnaces work from the clues she has gathered," Ami replied, trying very hard to ignore the feeling of the holy magic working on her. "I don't think she has all that much to start with, and the dark god's realm doesn't really seem well suited for experim– eep!"

An unbearably white glow shone straight into her eyes.

Instinctively, she squeezed them shut and turned her face away even as she ducked and rolled sideways off her chair. "Snyder! Enough already! There's nothing wrong with me in the first place!"

The acolyte's robes swished as he took a startled step back. He raised his arm to scratch the back of his head as he watched her get off the floor. "How can you be sure? Your scanner wasn't good enough to catch that infiltrator in the first place now, was it?" he replied, the dark circles under his eyes explaining why he sounded grumpier than usual.

"I wasn't scanning for it!" she protested as she backed away from him, briefly glancing to her right to ensure she was staying outside of Cathy's grabbing range. "I certainly scanned myself very thoroughly for any abnormalities after the incident."

With a tired shrug, Snyder let himself drop into one of the armchairs. "Well, I admit I did not find anything either," he sighed. "Still, I would feel better if you underwent another few cleansing cycles just in case. Direct servants of the dark gods should not be underestimated."

"And this one was working with a Keeper too," Jered took the opportunity to interject. "Unless the Unraveller has her own dungeon with imps now, which is a scary thought." He was walking up and down at one end of the room, flipping through a notebook. "My informants haven't mentioned any rumours about Keeper minions with crystals stuck in their heads, but they might not have deemed it relevant information. I'll tell them to keep an eye out."

"You think the crystal retreated to a temple in the Underworld?" Cathy asked.

"Well, we found a broken-down Underworld portal in the cave the imp showed up in, and we know the Unraveller can temporarily restore those," Jered answered.

Ami shook her head. "I doubt the portal could have been restored quickly enough to react to my discovery of the intruder. Besides, I got a rough direction when that imp destroyed my crystal ball."

"You did?" Cathy asked, perking up.

"I was looking through my visor at the time," Ami confirmed with a small smile. "The hostile magic came from somewhere to the southwest."

"Where exactly?" Jered asked, looking around the room for a map.

Ami shrugged apologetically. "Sorry, that's about as precise as I can tell. The magic was barely detectable in the first place."

The wavy-haired man sighed. "Well, it's better than nothing, I suppose. Excludes most of the continent. I can check which Keepers are rumoured to be active in the region," he offered.

Jadeite, who had simply listened quietly so far, looked thoughtful. "Speaking of rumours, it would be unfortunate for your unassailable image if news about you being laid low by a sneak attack spread," he said. "Did you do anything to keep that warlock who assisted you from blabbing?"

Ami suppressed a grimace. Of course she hadn't done anything bad to Harold. "He's smart enough to figure out that he was the only one around when it happened, so I would know exactly where such rumours started," she said. "He'll keep quiet. In any case, he's too busy trying to track down the crystal to make trouble."

"Wait, I thought it was gone or hiding inside of a dark temple, completely shielded from scrying?" Cathy asked.

"He's not using scrying. I don't think the part about there being more than one crystal in the memories I saw was false, so we are looking for other, similar crystals using sympathetic magic. The dwarfs did something similar to create a magical link to my computer and interfere with it," Ami explained.

"What are you using for the search?" Snyder asked, looking interested.

"I have made an accurate replica of the crystal using the dungeon heart and my recordings," she replied. "Aside from that, I also have the warlocks looking for individual parts of the gem furnace that was stolen."

Snyder nodded with a thoughtful expression. "That sounds reasonable. You should also take measures to prevent the opposite party from using them the same way. If they forged a sympathetic link to your furnaces, they could interfere with them."

"Good point." Ami decided that adding some individuality to the various furnaces wouldn't take much effort. Giving a few brushes and different buckets of paint to a bunch of imps and telling them to go wild would be more than enough. Unfortunately, it was likely that the thief had already taken similar precautions with the stolen parts.

"Any progress so far?" Cathy wanted to know.

Ami's face fell. "Less than I would have hoped. Getting the crystal to look just right is difficult, since it has those moving patterns inside. I have recordings, so replicating them with glamour is possible, but the problem is that the targets need to show the same patterns at the time the searching spell is cast," she said.

Snyder frowned. "I see. Under those circumstances, you would have to repeatedly restart the sequence and recast the spell, hoping it matches the target the moment you do through sheer luck," the acolyte evaluated.

"Yes, and that's assuming that the movement of the patterns is repetitive," she replied. "I'm still looking for a better solution. Torian suggested searching for crystal-shaped forehead wounds instead."

Cathy sucked in a breath, the corners of her lips curving downwards in disgust.

Ami felt a little queasy too. "I can make mindless imps, that's how I feed the vampires after all, but his suggestion is still not very practical," she said. "Depth, angle and position of the wound would have to closely match, and that's assuming that the individual differences between organisms won't prevent a match from the start."

"You are searching by the shape of the crystal then, I assume?" Snyder said.

"Yes, but it's getting too many results," Ami sighed. "The shape of the Unraveller crystal matches that of natural quartz crystals, so the spell just uses up its power to return a flood of useless results."

"In other words, the thing is designed with in-built countermeasures to tracking magic," Jered summarised.

Ami had reached the same conclusion. It was reasonable to assume that the Unraveller had a greater breadth of knowledge about magic than she did. Therefore, the crystals were likely to have adequate protections against common means of magically affecting them.

Ami closed her eyes and pondered the problem. Ordinary approaches were useless. Did she have unique strengths she could apply to the situation that the dark god wouldn't have considered? A moment later, her eyes opened, shining with determination. "Jadeite, I need a portal to space!"

After reassuring the dark general that no, she didn't mean for him to open a portal into the vacuum of space right that moment, Ami had quickly prepared what she needed. This amounted to bare room with a solid glass floor that served as the ceiling of an equally bare room below.

She nodded encouragingly at Jadeite, who disappeared from her side in a blur of vertical black lines and reappeared below the glass.

He extended his right arm before looking up through the transparent ceiling at the imitation Unraveller crystal glued to the topmost point of the rock dome above.

Ami felt her face flush. He could see up her skirt from down there, couldn't he? Due to her leotard, this wasn't a problem, but she still turned a little sideways so he could at most see her leg. Nevertheless, she almost felt disappointed when he looked away after a brief moment, having verified that he was pointing at the right spot.

A flat oval of darkness appeared in front of him as the portal opened, and his blond curls moved as wind picked up. Leftover dust from the imps digging out the room trickled down the walls and crawled towards the growing gateway.

Jadeite stuck around until the portal was as tall as he was, visibly leaning back to avoid the suction pulling him in. The moment the magical gate stabilized, he teleported away.

"Thanks," Ami said as he reappeared near her, but she kept watching the room below.

The whooshing noise died down when the last of the air below disappeared into space. The surrounding rock creaked faintly from the shift in pressure, but nothing visibly moved and the thick glass floor remained solid as well.

Ami summoned her visor and inspected the walls. Good, nothing was shifting or vibrating. She needed the room to be at rest to take accurate measurements.

Straight below her, the planet was partially visible through the portal. Clouds covered the area Ami was most interested in, but that wasn't a hindrance for her plan. At this point, she was simply measuring the distance to the ground.

Satisfied, she entered the numbers into her palmtop and turned her attention to the table. She needed a map appropriately scaled to the portal's elevation, and so she had her computer project an appropriate shape onto her visor. Now she simply traced what she was seeing with her Keeper powers, quickly engraving the map into the glass floor.

The replica on the ceiling wasn't made of crystal at all; it was solid steel instead. All it had in common with Ami's quarry was its shape.

She had picked steel because it was sturdy, as it needed to survive acting as the anchor for a sympathetic search spell with far more power than usual. Enough power that she could form links to all those natural quartz crystals in the target region before running out. Other Keepers might be able to manage it too with enough ritual preparation, but they couldn't simply concentrate on the spell, pick their target, and then let the mana flow.

As she just did.

Faint light gathered at the bottommost tip of the fake crystal and shot straight down, passing through the map etched onto the glass floor on its way through the portal. Like a spotlight shining out of the replica, it expanded the farther away it got from its point of origin, forming a cone that was wide enough to fill the entire portal where it passed through.

The individual threads that formed the light cone were only visible with much closer inspection. Each one connected the replica with exactly one crystal shaped just like it. Seen together, they looked like one single solid shape.

Ami cast a second spell, infusing the map with mana. Little glowing dots appeared where the threads passed through its surface. Finally, she shifted the threads into invisibility until only the dots remained.

It looked like someone had spilled glowing sand onto her map.

Magnified by Ami's visor, she could see the individual grains that each represented the location of a crystal. There wasn't much empty space between them, and some even overlapped, but her approach had worked. If she had tried this from a vantage point closer to the ground, more of the threads would have been overlapping each other, and she wouldn't have been able to tell them apart. She smiled in satisfaction at having bypassed another layer of the Unraveller's security.

With quiet footsteps, Jadeite moved to her side and looked at the map. "You seem pleased."

Her smile faded a little. "Yes, but now comes the most time-consuming part."

"Finding the correct targets in that mess?"

"No, that's easy, I only have to pick the few that move," she answered. At least it was an easy task for her. Anyone without her visor and computer would have to get creative to spot or even observe the minuscule movements of a select few dots among the masses. Sure, some of them were probably false positives, like natural crystals getting swept along inside of rivers, but her real targets should be among the dots she had identified.

Jadeite blinked in surprise. "Then the hard part is…?"

With a wave of her hand, a desk and a chair dropped out of thin air and landed before her with a clatter. She picked up a pen. "Copying down all of the suspicious coordinates so my warlocks can investigate them."

The airship hovered hundreds of meters above the ground, facing a terrace the size of a basketball court carved directly into the vertical cliff face. The vessel's propellers hummed, hard at work to keep the howling winds from pushing it out of position. With a clank, the cabin split along a horizontal, gilded seam and opened like a giant maw.

The small groups of people assembled around various standing tables stood frozen and watched the widening gap with pale faces and clenched jaws. Maids and valets in red-jacketed uniforms stood out in the open, tablets threatening to slip from their shaking hands.

Ami's mouth felt dry as she faced the silent crowd. Head held high? Check. Breathing even? Check. Facial muscles relaxed? Check. Hands not clasped in front of herself, although she dearly wanted to? Check. Reassured that she had successfully avoided timid body language so far, she calmed down fractionally. She was slowly getting more used to being the centre of attention, but, well, when she was talking to her employees, then the audience was friendly.

The looks she was receiving from the elaborately dressed courtiers and their bodyguards were anything but.

She supposed she could at least count herself lucky that the serving staff avoided meeting her gaze at all.

With a flex of her Keeper powers, the ice underneath her feet rose from the floor, lifting her up. It had been sculpted into the shape of a real snowflake, magnified enough to carry her as well as the six bodyguards her role demanded. They were ice golems, formed up in a semi-circle behind her and covered from head to toe in armour that was mostly ornamental, but disguised their true nature.

A ripple went through the crowd as the intricate, glittering platform emerged from the open cabin and drifted towards the terrace.

Ami wasn't going slowly for their benefit. She was more concerned about keeping her balance than about giving people time to move away or about dragging out the moment. Right now, she was envying her golems who didn't have to worry about high heels or the wind turning her voluminous, bell-shaped dress into a sail.

Her fingers moved down to the silky fabric whipping around her legs like a flag. The motion, while intended to keep the dress down, also allowed her to confirm that the wiry, rune-shaped keystones sewed into its layers were still present. Losing them and setting the entire place on fire when Nailcastle's wards combusted around her would be even more of a faux-pas than stumbling.

Although it would easily convince everyone that she didn't really want to be here.

The snowflake touched down on the polished sandstone floor with a clinking noise. A well-timed spell shattered it into a mist of glittering ice particles that billowed up around Ami.

One of the servants, a well-groomed dwarf whose jacket had epaulettes and an extra helping of golden chains, gaped at the towering misty column dissipating into the wind, his gaze focused on the two burning red eyes shining from within. As if waking from a daze, the herald closed his mouth with an audible click. His chest swelled as he sucked in a large amount of air. "Her Imperial Majesty, Empress Mercury of the Avatar Islands!" he bellowed.

The echoes of his proclamation faded away at the same time as the last wisps of icy mist drifted over the terrace's railing. His voice reminded the people that, yes, there was now a Keeper among them, but that the situation was under control and that formalities were still being observed.

People slowly started moving and talking to each other in hushed voices again. From what Ami could overhear, most were arguing about whether or not they would have to approach her.

Loud footsteps came from the arched doorway that led deeper into the fortress, and people relaxed as they recognised the approaching figure in jewel-encrusted ceremonial armour.

Duke Libasheshtan approached with a steady, dignified stride, his ducal crown gleaming on his brow and his purple mantle waving behind him. As the host, he was in charge of welcoming important new arrivals. Since Ami had bypassed the hero gate and arrived directly at the reception area, he had missed her entrance.

Similar to the other guests, Ami felt a bit relieved upon seeing him and was more than willing to wait and let him take the lead. Her own role during the gala required little more than her presence, but she was still worried that she would say or do something that people would take the wrong way. Even being too friendly with someone could land that person in trouble.

Admittedly, it didn't look as if she would have to worry too much about that. So far, people were at best directing strained, fake smiles her way if she looked at them for too long. If she wanted conversation, she would have to initiate it. The thought prompted her to search for familiar faces among the sea of pinched, wary expressions.

She spotted the fairy sisters almost instantly. With their glitter, wings, and colourful hair, they would have been unmissable even without their revealing uniforms sticking out like a sore thumb among the fully covered crowd.

The next attention-grabbing figure she recognised was a large human with an impressive moustache. Baron Leopold was surrounded by a group of dwarfs fawning over his armour, whom he ignored in favour of watching her over their heads.

Ami's eyebrows creep upwards. She hadn't expected to see the human noble here, but in hindsight, his presence wasn't too surprising. The dwarfs wouldn't have rewarded him with a suit of adamantine plate if he wasn't a staunch and valued ally.

"Wait, those winged girls are not hers?" a puzzled voice whispered, its nervous tone drawing Ami's attention. She had perceived the whisper with her Keeper senses, which, on foreign territory, meant that the speaker was near one of her employees.

Without moving her head, Ami focused her attention on Jered. Dressed in a colourful outfit that included a stiff collar and a surprising amount of frills along the sides of his pants, he fit right in with the other high-ranking dwarfs. Arm in arm with Umbra, whose human glamour was almost unnecessary underneath the many layers of blue and black velvet and veils, he was staying near the corner of the terrace farthest from its edge.

The clean-shaved human who had whispered was one of the twelve Silver Hawks mercenaries Jered had brought as bodyguards, which was pushing the limits of politeness. After all, it implied that he didn't trust the Duke to keep his guests safe. Of course, his real safety net was Umbra, who would teleport him out at the first sign of trouble.

Jered raised an eyebrow and leaned in closer to the speaker. An amused smile played around his lips as he replied in a hushed voice, "You had better not let Ambassador Camilla from the Shining Concord Empire hear that you mistook her bodyguards for Keeper minions." He pointed out the blonde fairy wearing a dress similar in style to Ami's, aside from lacking the royal purple and having an open back to accommodate her wings.

To be fair, Ami could hardly fault the man for making that mistake. Unfortunately, the fairies had been unimpressed by her warning that their traditional uniform, while sensibly lightweight and streamlined for fliers who kept themselves warm with magic and had to swim occasionally, might not be the ideal attire for this event. Glancing over at the sisters in question, she noticed that Tilia, Roselle, and Melissa were standing close together and glaring at the group of mercenaries.

Another of Jered's hirelings, who had been keeping a vigilant eye on Ami, turned his head towards his boss in alarm. "S-Seriously?"

Jered nodded slowly, and the man's face, which was marred by razor cuts, went bright red, and his shoulders slumped. "Shit, I totally embarrassed myself there."

A female voice came from the face-concealing helmet of the smaller figure to the right. "Godsdammit, Jack! And here I was wondering why the dwarfs were glaring more at us than at her. She made a concealed hand gesture in Ami's direction.

Yet another mercenary in lighter armour and with a thin moustache nodded. "Yes, I was finding that odd, too," he said in a low, cultured tone. "My father has a close enough relationship with some of them that they must have recognised me, and they are usually impeccably polite when dealing with nobility."

The blushing mercenary groaned.

Jered snorted. "In your party member's defence, it's not his actions that they are have an issue with, Prince Norton. They are actually more annoyed by your presence here."

"Excuse me?"

"You must have some idea of how unpalatable this entire regency arrangement is to them," Jered elaborated. "With noble witnesses from foreign realms, it becomes considerably harder to, let's say, interpret its terms loosely when they become inconvenient."

The prince looked thoughtful. "I had not considered that. Should I leave? I obviously won't expect pay for-"

Jered interrupted him with a short laugh. "Denied. That would let all my effort go to waste. It's neither simple nor cheap to find a bunch of noble scions so far down the line of succession that they work for hire."

The woman in the suit of full plate whirled to face him. "You! You bastard!" She snarled. "You are working for her!" Her face remained invisible under her helmet, but her clenching fists and aggressive posture left no doubt about her feelings.

With a soundless, gliding motion, Umbra advanced half a step and tilted her head in Ami's direction.

Ami, while not too enthused about Jered's gloating, took the cue and turned towards the group of mercenaries.

Her gaze had the same effect as dumping a bucket of ice water over the angry adventurers closing in on her employee. The circle widened as they backed off, swallowing and lowering their heads. Some even tried shuffling sideways until their wavy-haired employer was between her and them.

She stopped paying attention to the situation when Duke Libasheshtan finally finished his walk to her location.

He welcomed her with a bow deep enough that the six neat braids of his black beard dangled freely in the air. "Welcome, your Imperial Majesty. I hope you had a pleasant journey."

Her return bow was shallower, in accordance with her higher title. "Duke Libasheshtan," she greeted him, "I did indeed enjoy the view."

It was even true. Being above ground after spending so much time underground felt very pleasant, and the forested mountainsides passing by on both sides of her airship had presented her with some spectacular panoramas. She hadn't indulged too much, as she could work with her dungeon remotely, but she had certainly been paying attention to Nailcastle as the rocky column grew larger and larger in the distance. The arrangement of balconies and terraces jutting out of its near-vertical cliffs, interspersed with occasional trees and vines, reminded her of artful rock gardens.

"Very good, ma'am" the Duke replied stiffly. "Let us drink to that." He handed her an alcoholic beverage from one of the standing tables as part of the formal dwarven greeting.

To her, it felt a little odd, but none of the many guests watching them both batted an eye at the proceedings.

She accepted the offered drink, which didn't come in the flutelike glass she had expected. Instead, a weighty stein decorated with intricate geometrical patterns occupied her hands. Overlapping squares that represented salt crystals, if she didn't miss her guess. Admittedly, at this altitude it made some sense to use furniture and tableware too heavy to be easily blown away.

She took a sip of the mushroom-based wine, and immediately regretted that her glamour included functional taste buds. The flavour wasn't bad enough to make her grimace, but it was definitely an acquired taste. Perhaps the dwarfs were aware of this, as the stein certainly contained enough wine to make a serious attempt at acquiring it.

Duke Libasheshtan lowered his own stein with a pleased expression. "I'm glad you had a smooth journey, ma'am," he said. He bowed again and took a step away from her. "Please excuse me, but duty calls." While turning towards the entrance, he stopped briefly when facing the orchestra, and gave a hand signal.

Twelve dwarfs seated on two long benches started playing a slow tune on various percussive and stringed instruments.

The Duke glanced back at Ami a final time. "Please enjoy mingling with the other guests, your Imperial Majesty."

Clearly alarmed by his parting words, the closest guests turned away or moved a little faster when Ami's gaze moved in their direction.

A shadow briefly fell over terrace, prompting a small hitch in the music. People looked up with nervous expressions as they spotted Ami's airship circling the spire at some distance like a shark. To someone who wasn't aware how much volume the vessel dedicated to lifting gas, it would certainly look massive and menacing.

While looking up, Ami noticed that there was a roof that could be lowered like a drawbridge over the terrace in case of inclement weather. Deciding to give the other guests some time to acclimatise to her presence, she remained in place and admired her surroundings. Especially the highest parts of the fortress, where the rock spire tapered to a point, bristled with an impressive amount of orchards layered not unlike rice paddies.

When it became clear that she wasn't going to immediately seek out people to corrupt, the attention on her slowly died down to cautious glances, and conversations picked up again.

Ami decided that she had waited long enough, put down her stein, and stepped away from it. She gracefully pretended to not notice a shaking maidservant almost tripping when she got close enough to sense that Ami's golem guards had no bones.

She acknowledged Jered with a nod and ordered all but two of her golems to remain behind as she directed her steps toward Camilla. Out of everyone around here, the fairy ambassador was probably the least reluctant to chat with Ami, which would demonstrate to the others that she wouldn't hurt them for trying to talk to her.

The blonde fairy in question was near a dwarf who looked like a monk, albeit a monk who had decided that poverty and abstinence were for other people. The rope constraining his rotund belly glittered with threads of gold, his robe depicted a colourful landscape, and the staff he was leaning on could have doubled as a king's sceptre.

Ami recognised him from images as Roderser, the designated representative King Ral had sent to attend in his place.

While physically close to him, Camilla wasn't paying him any attention right now. She was too busy backing away from a dwarf with an amicable expression who was talking loudly while he intruded into her personal space.

"… wouldn't you agree, Ambassador?" the pushy dwarf said. He was wearing a colourful ensemble with purely decorative pieces of armour, but most of it was covered by a long tabard with the goat-headed sigil of Sirith Anlur.

Camilla, visibly uncomfortable, glanced over at Roderser for a moment. "Ah, Ambassador Bagozkal, I believe it would be presumptuous of me to comment on internal affairs of your realm with only superficial knowledge," the blonde said after a moment of awkward silence. Her gaze furtively darted towards her oldest sister Dandel, who was standing guard nearby and carefully failed to make eye contact, her expression serene.

"Oh, you should find the situation familiar to your own or the good Duke's, I'm sure even Roderser must agree," the dwarf from Sirith Anlur said. It earned him a look of barely-concealed loathing from the monk-like diplomat, which he completely ignored in order to continue, "I would be more than happy to elaborate on the details during," he glanced back over his shoulder, perhaps noticing the ambient conversation volume lowering as Ami approached, "during… excuse me please something really urgent came up I must go!"

Ambassador Bagozkal's speedy departure left Camilla blinking in relieved confusion until she noticed Ami approaching. At that point, she just barely managed to disguise a brief laugh as a cough.

Roderser glanced at Ami, frowned, looked back at the departing Ambassador Bagozkal, and when he turned back to the approaching Keeper, his face had settled in an expression that looked, on average, pleased.

At that point, baron Leopold stepped in front of the dwarven representative like a human roadblock, impeding Ami's path.

Ami hesitated, thrown a little off-script by the fact that he was another noble guest, not a bodyguard. Was this him being rude and running interference, or did he simply want to talk to her? She wasn't even close enough yet for the gesture to be unambiguously directed at her. If this was intended to be a subtle snub, it was a plausibly deniable one. Should she be confrontational about this for her act? She wished Duke Libasheshtan was around to help sort things out.

She looked over at the wide doorway, trying to see if he was close enough to smooth things over. Unfortunately, he was at the other end of a long hallway lined with columns and statues, standing near a hero gate carved into the wall. Bright white light spilled from the portal's back wall, which turned into a featureless white rectangle.

A tall, wide-shouldered silhouette stepped out of the pane of white, and golden reflections spilled out into the hallway.

"Lord Avatar! Welcome to Nailcastle!" the Duke's enthusiastic greeting drew attention to the tall, armoured figure who had just appeared from the hero gate.

Word of the Avatar's arrival spread within moments, and a tide of guests swept out of the reception area and into the hallway, towards the perceived safety of his proximity. They did try to look nonchalant about it – of course they weren't fleeing, they were merely eager to meet the esteemed Lord Avatar! However, the way the crowd streamed around Ami at a distance revealed its true intentions.

The herald, whose job it was to announce newcomers as soon as they stepped out onto the terrace, was wringing his hands as he frowned at the crowd now congesting the hallway.

Ami shot him a sympathetic look. Having everyone ignore protocol and preventing him from announcing one of the most important guests had to be awkward.

Noticing her attention, the dwarf paled and looked ready to run off too.

Smile turning brittle, she looked in Jered's direction instead. By now, the terrace was practically empty aside from the nervous staff and her own small delegation. Even Jered's mercenaries had abandoned him.

She exchanged a questioning look with the wavy-haired man, who just shrugged and pointed in the direction of the entrance, where the guests were slowly being pushed back out onto the terrace.

The noise level rose as people loudly vied for the Avatar's attention. Despite the press of bodies, the dwarfs somehow managed to show proper respect and deference by clearing a path for him and Duke Libasheshtan.

The Avatar, however, was currently listening to the tall elf fortunate enough to have gotten hold of the spot to his left. Unlike the dark elves Ami was familiar with, the androgynous figure had both a deep tan and not only long, flowing hair, but also a matching blond beard.

The elf, who was wearing some kind of polished breastplate made of artfully interwoven twigs, was gesticulating widely even as he leaned in closer to the Avatar with a pleading expression.

Ami strained to hear what they were talking about, but couldn't listen in due to the noisy crowd. Her Keeper senses didn't work on foreign territory unless she had an employee nearby, and both Jered and Umbra hadn't moved from their spot yet. She wished she could have smuggled in some rats inside her golems, but dwarven senses made that plan unfeasible.

"My lip reading isn't great, but I'm getting that he's requesting a visit to his homeland due to increasing Keeper pressure," Jered sent her a mental message. "Also, people might get nervous if you keep frowning that hard in the Avatar's direction."

Ami froze and noticed that, yes, she was staring and yes, people were starting to notice. With a faint blush, she turned aside and told one of her disguised golems to fetch her a snack. The Duke could fill her in on the details later.

Meanwhile, a dwarven courtier had somehow managed to replace the elf at the Avatar's side. Lacking the height of the pointy-eared man, he couldn't stop others from addressing the Avatar straight over his head. Unable to get a word in, his frustration was visibly rising.

The fairy sisters had to be feeling the same way. In a scramble with dwarfs, they were physically at a disadvantage, and occasional glimpses of bare skin in the crowd revealed that they were being pushed farther and farther away from the golden-armoured man.

The pressure let up only when he finally stepped out of the hallway and people spilled back out onto the terrace, dispersing a little. The poor herald's redundant announcement of the Avatar's presence went completely ignored as the group slowly rotated around him.

Amadeus endured the attention with remarkable patience, returning smiles and exchanging brief sentences with the people trying to engage him in conversation. After a few minutes though, he raised his hand. "A moment of quiet, please," his voice echoed out.

Within a few breaths, the shouts and clamouring died down, and even the orchestra stopped playing.

"Thank you." He lowered his hand and turned to the dwarf to his right. "Duke Libashestan. As our gracious host, you must be keeping track of everyone who has arrived so far."

"Indeed, Lord Avatar," the Duke replied, nodding in confirmation.

The Avatar straightened to his full height and turned one full circle, his gaze sweeping over everyone assembled. "Correct me if I am wrong, but it appears to me that all the important guests have already arrived?"

"We are not missing anyone above the rank of court scribe, Lord Avatar," the Duke said.

"Good. In that case, I request that we proceed with the ceremony straight away," Amadeus said.

A few surprised gasps came from the guests.

"I realise that the request may appear rude, but my duties are many, and strictly adhering to protocol is most assuredly not the most beneficial use of my time," the Avatar continued.

A murmur went through the crowd. Some dwarfs looked scandalised, but nobody seemed ready to argue with the Avatar that slaying monsters was less important than the gala's timetable. A few glanced over at Ami with thoughtful and satisfied looks, interpreting his words as a faint insult aimed at her.

Duke Libasheshtan drew in a deep breath. "That is, well, I am sure nobody would find fault with accommodating you, Lord Avatar, unless perhaps her Imperial Majesty disagrees?" He turned towards Ami expectantly.

People held their breaths as they awaited the dark empress' reaction.

Put on the spot, Ami remained quiet for a tense few seconds. The faster this awkwardness was over the better, in her opinion, but she was supposed to sell the idea that she was being coerced into this. "I suppose it would be rather petty of me if I dragged things out," she said with a faint smile, as if she was considering doing just that. "Fine, go ahead."

"Thank you for your cooperation, your Imperial Majesty," the Avatar replied in a tone so dry it made a mockery out of his polite words.

"Very well," the Duke called over several servants, who darted off to convey his orders.

A loud fanfare preceded the herald's next proclamation. "Esteemed Majesties, Lords, and honoured guests, your attention please! By personal request of his Exalted Lordship the Avatar and with agreement from her Imperial Majesty, Empress Mercury, his Grace, Duke Libasheshtan, will formally be accepting the regency over the realm of her Imperial Majesty slightly ahead of schedule! Please assemble at your assigned positions around the podium!"

Two servants were unrolling a red carpet down the three stairs that led up to the raised platform he had indicated, and dwarven soldiers in parade armour arrived, walking in formation as the orchestra started playing a solemn march.

On Ami's cue, her own guards joined the forming honour guard, their darker-coloured full plate contrasting with the shining silver tones of the dwarven armour.

The Duke inclined his head towards her in an invitation, and she joined him at the far edge of the red carpet.

She took the lead, walking one step ahead of him through the honour guard due to her higher rank. Now that the ceremony proper had started, she was feeling calmer than before despite the many eyes tracking her every move. For this part, everything was planned and rehearsed, so she knew exactly what to expect. It also helped that she mostly just had to sit on her throne and look regal while the Duke handled most of the talking.

He walked up to the pedestal and began his speech with a long-winded introduction about how this occasion was grounds for celebration as it provided ample opportunities to redress an unfortunate situation.

Ami had heard the speech so many times during the rehearsals that she wasn't paying attention any more. Instead, she watched the audience as the Duke went on about responsibility, duty, and proper upbringing.

The faces looking up at her remained impassive, though some twitching mouth corners and subtly arching eyebrows suggested that people were contemplating Duke Libasheshtan's words with a healthy amount of scepticism.

She couldn't really blame them when she agreed that the idea of handling a Keeper with pedagogy was, well, hopelessly optimistic at best. Thinking of Keeper–related issues, she had some time to check up on her dungeon, because the Duke would be talking at length about tradition and ancestors. Carefully keeping her eyes looking straight ahead, she moved her Keeper sight back to Salthalls, where her warlocks were working with crystal balls.

The huge list with potential Unraveller crystal locations pinned to the wall now had all but two entries crossed out. Her warlocks had split into two groups, each of which was working on putting together a small-scale model of a sprawling dungeon. With how little they had mapped out so far, they would be busy scrying for some time yet.

If they found any traces of gem furnace experimentation, then Ami would have to deal with those complexes.

Certain familiar parts of the Duke's speech caught Ami's attention before she could really get deeply into strategising. The next part required her participation.

The dwarf turned towards her with a stern look, his purple cape billowing. "Your Imperial Majesty, I hereby accept the duty of wielding the imperial authority and governing your realm in your name. As your regent and guardian, I shall ensure the well-being of yourself and your subjects until you reach the age of majority."

Ami stayed silent for a moment as if she was having second thoughts. Finally, she rose from her throne and nodded once. "I, Empress Mercury of the Avatar Islands, thank you for your service to my realm." That the service wasn't to herself was the important part here.

"I, Avatar Amadeus, witness and confirm Duke Libasheshtan's appointment to the position of Regent," the Avatar said, his eyes shining with faint light. "Congratulations, Regent Libasheshtan."

Following his example, the audience offered reluctant applause and congratulations too. The clapping from Sirith Anlur's representative was particularly slow and sarcastic. He also broke protocol as he failed to get in line to offer personal congratulations to the Duke. Instead, he directly approached the Avatar with a drink.

Of all the glares directed at the shameless dwarf, those of the fairies were the fiercest as they politely waited in line. When they finally got close to the Avatar too, Roderser had already joined the conversation.

"…preposterous! The situation is completely different! He is not working for a Keeper, but in a position of authority over one! Do not be taken in by his honeyed words, Lord Avatar," the bald dwarf said, frowning all the time. "They have learned nothing! Ambassador Camilla, isn't it true that the dark empress commissioned some goods from Sirith Anlur?" He turned his head so suddenly in the blonde's direction that he startled her.

"Wha- yes, but-"

"And that's willingly and knowingly serving a Keeper!" Roderser said, not letting Camilla finish her sentence.

"You have some gall twisting a simple business transaction into something supporting your continuing agenda of discrimination!" Ambassador Bagozkal growled. "Ambassador Camilla, your own trade experiences support my view?"

Camilla perked up. "Actually, I have a different issue to discuss with the Lord Avatar-"

"Which I'm sure you'll be able to do to your full satisfaction during the feast," Bagozkal interrupted again, drawing a frown from both the fairy and Roderser. "To stay on topic-"

"No." This time it was Amadeus who interrupted, reddish eyebrows narrowed in irritation. "Unfortunately, I cannot spare the time to stay for the feast."

His careless statement, while intended to support Camilla, neglected to take the audience into account. The guests who hadn't had the opportunity to talk to him yet overheard that he would be leaving soon, the crowd surged, and the poor fairy was swept away in the stream of bodies despite her vocal protests.

"All right, enough is enough!" Anise declared. The ruby-eyed fairy drew some curious looks as she jumped high into the air and fluttered her wings to escape from the bodies pressing against each other.

Ami, still sitting on her throne and neither inclined nor expected to mingle, was a little surprised when the fairy landed nearby and stomped in her direction.

Anise leaned down and whispered, "You told us we could plead our case to the Avatar, so come along and help us out!" With that, she grabbed Ami by the wrist and tugged.

A full stein shattered on the ground, and people stared wide-eyed. Someone stuttered "Sh-shameless!" and a few dwarfs tried to duck behind the standing tables for cover. One of the drummers missed a beat.

Ami, for her part, had already let herself be dragged along for a few steps before she really started thinking about how this might affect her image. Empress meekly following a girl who's half-naked by dwarven standards? She felt her ears burn. Oh well. In the end, she did owe the fairies a favour, and she would have to start interacting more with people at some point.

Not that it looked as if she would get to do so; Anise's plan to use her as sycophant repellent was working very well. The servants watching her move towards the Avatar fled first, alerting the guests at the rim of the crowd. Their departure in turn alerted the guests deeper in, causing a chain reaction that parted the sea of bodies before her.

Ambassador Bagozkal yelped when he noticed how close she was all of a sudden and ran without a thought for propriety, leaving Camilla, the Avatar, Roderser, and Baron Leopold to form a small, isolated group of their own.

Again, the moustached baron interposed himself between Ami and Roderser, glowering down at her. "Lord Avatar? Why don't you just deal with that Keeper brat right now? I mean, she's right here."

Ami shot him an incredulous look, wondering if he had a death wish.

No, with the way he was smirking now he had to be testing her? She quickly closed her mouth.

"Trying would be pointless," Amadeus replied with a frown. "That's not her real body."

"Huh. You are the Avatar. I'm sure you have some way around that." He paused, considering. "If it takes some time to deploy, I can hold her off for a little."

The Avatar buried his face in his palm, incidentally flashing a ring on his finger. "Baron Leopold, why must you do this every time? Besides, you know I am unable to bring my full power to bear like this."

The adamantine-armored figure slumped and let out a long sigh. "How unfortunate." A moment later, he perked up again and grinned at Ami. "So, Empress, I hear you have a new reaper. Think it's up for a fight?"

Ami found herself actually taking a step back. She was far from the only one staring at the baron with a wary expression, though the Avatar only looked exasperated. "Well, um, Rabixtrel is always ready to battle, but he probably wouldn't want to make the journey," she finally replied.

"Lord Avatar!" Camilla said, jumping at the opportunity offered by the awkward silence. "My sisters and I were caught in the magical accident that recently befell Salthalls. This leaves us in a shaky position as far as the laws of the Shining Concord Empire are concerned. Could you please help us convince our superiors that we are still fit for our duties?"

It wasn't the most diplomatic request that the Avatar had ever received, but he thought about it for a moment. "Provided that is, in fact, the case, I'm inclined to assist you. However, this is neither the time nor place for the thorough examination required. I will instruct my seneschal to schedule a proper meeting and contact you."

"Thank you very much, Lord Avatar!" Camilla said, bowing deeply.

"We'll be eternally grateful," her sisters chimed in, bowing too.

The dinner gong rang loudly, which answered Ami's question about where Duke Libasheshtan had disappeared to during all this.

"And that is my cue to bid you farewell, your Imperial Majesty, your Excellencies, Lords and Ladies," Amadeus said. Using Ami's presence as a dam that held back the tide of his admirers, he strode towards the hero gate at a fast pace.

Last edited: May 10, 2021